The American University in Cairo
School of Global Affairs and Public Policy

MUSLIM MINORITIES IN THE WEST:
BETWEEN FIQH OF MINORITIES AND INTEGRATION

A Thesis Submitted to the Department of Law

in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Arts in International Human Rights Law

By
Dina M. Taha

June 2012
MUSLIM MINORITIES IN THE WEST:
BETWEEN FIQH OF MINORITIES AND INTEGRATION

A Thesis Submitted by
Dina M. Taha

June 2012

in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of
Master of Arts in International Human Rights Law has been approved by

Professor Gianluca Parolin ______________________
Thesis Adviser
The American University in Cairo
Date __________________

Professor Nesrine Badawi ______________________
Thesis First Reader
The American University in Cairo
Date __________________

Professor Thomas Skouteris ______________________
Thesis Second Reader
The American University in Cairo
Date __________________

Professor Thomas Skouteris ______________________
Law Department Chair
Date __________________

Ambassador Nabil Fahmy ______________________
Dean of GAPP
Date __________________
Acknowledgment

I would like to thank Professor Gianluca Parolin for his patience and insistence on bringing the best out of this thesis, and the law department at AUC for their continuous cooperation and support till the very last day. I would also like to thank Professors Yusuf al-Qaradâwî and Taha Jabir al-‘Alwânî, founders of Fiqh of minorities, for their time, knowledge and guidance. Finally, sincere thanks to my family, old and new, parents, brother and husband for their never ending support, belief, and wide hopes, that leaves me no option but to always strive for the best.
ABSTRACT

Fiqh of minorities is a specific framework/perspective of the general Fiqh that looks with one eye at the objectives and principles of Shari’a, and the other eye to consider the reality of Muslim minorities in cases that will, usually, only arise in the situation where Muslims constitute a minority. Fiqh of minority is, arguably, based on the premises that Muslim existence in non-Muslim communities, should promote a civilizational dialogue between the Islamic culture and other cultures. This paper argues that Fiqh of minorities’ scholars attempt to provide legal opinions and solutions for Muslim minorities in the West in order for them to fulfill their role as both good Muslims and good citizens, i.e. positive integration as they define it. The paper asks whether the cultural background of the scholar–Western/non-Western–impacts the nature of these solutions. The paper argues that Fiqh of minorities can provide two types of solutions a long-term one, for a permanent Muslim presence in the West, and a Short-term–exceptional–one, for a temporary presence. The first suggests that we are dealing with full citizens and members of the society who happen to be Muslims in religion, while the second assumes that Muslims’ natural and ultimate residence is in a Muslim majority country. Both types of solutions are reflected on the nature of the compromise Fiqh of minorities’ scholars, who in turn are affected by their own cultural backgrounds, provide to solve “the good Muslim, Good citizen equation”–i.e. whether they are perceived as "Western Muslims" or “a Muslim minority in the West".
Table of Contents

I- Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 1

II- Muslim minorities’ need for a special Fiqh ........................................................................ 4
   A- Arguments for and against Hijra to non-Muslim countries ........................................... 4
   B- Methodological and contextual reasons for Fiqh of minorities ....................................... 6
   C- Responsible citizens or committed Muslims ...................................................................... 8
   D- Criticism: Fiqh of minorities... an innovation? ............................................................... 10

III- Theoretical Framework of Fiqh of Minorities ................................................................. 13
   A- Position and Sources of Fiqh of minorities .................................................................. 14
   B- Objectives of Fiqh of minorities .................................................................................. 16
   C- Characteristics of Fiqh of minorities .......................................................................... 17
   D- Principles and Foundations of Fiqh of minorities .......................................................... 19

IV- Fiqh of Minorities and Integration ................................................................................ 23
   A- Integration ....................................................................................................................... 24
   B- Fiqh of minorities and integration: between Da’wa and Umma ................................... 25
      1- March and the concept of Da’wa .................................................................................. 26
      2- Mustafa and the Umma ............................................................................................... 27
   C- Contributors to Fiqh of minorities’ theory and integration .......................................... 28
      1- ‘Alwânî ......................................................................................................................... 29
      2- Qaradâwî ...................................................................................................................... 31
      3- Najjâr ........................................................................................................................... 33
      4- Bin Bayya .................................................................................................................... 35
      5- Ramadan ..................................................................................................................... 36
   D- Concluding remarks: Umma, integration, and Fiqh of minorities ............................ 38

V- Chapter Four: Fiqh of Minorities in Application ............................................................. 39
   A- Islâm al-zawja .................................................................................................................. 39
   B- interest-based mortgage ................................................................................................. 44
      1- Al-Haidary .................................................................................................................... 46
      2- ECFR and SSANA ....................................................................................................... 47
3- ‘Alwānī ..........................................................................................................................47
4- Ramadan ..........................................................................................................................48
C- Towards a Fatwa: Main Elements of Fiqh of Minorities’ Methodology .........................49
VI- Conclusion......................................................................................................................55
VII- Annex............................................................................................................................i
I- Introduction

What does a Muslim do when he or she has to follow the secular rules of a non-Muslim country that contradict his or her obligations to Sharī‘a? When is a Muslim marriage legitimate? How does divorce take place? What governs child custody? What happens when a woman converts to Islam but her husband does not? Immigrant Muslims face similar and many other issues while trying to live as both responsible citizens and committed Muslims. The most crucial issue; however, has to do with the validity and permissibility of Muslims, especially immigrants, residing in a non-Muslim community and whether it is acceptable in Islamic Sharī‘a, and if so then under which conditions. Even more, what about obtaining the nationality of an “infidel” country and thus obtaining the right to vote as well as political participation in a non-Muslim regime. This entails the duty of obligatory army recruitment which is usually not a problem unless there is a confrontation with another Muslim country.

The increasing Muslim presence in non-Muslim countries, made a group of Muslim scholars reach the conclusion that Innovation and compromise are key concepts for Muslims trying to live Islamic lives in the context of a Judeo-Christian country. Hence they introduced the Islamic jurisprudence of Muslim minorities [hereinafter Fiqh of minorities]. Fiqh of minorities is based on the premise that Muslim existence in non-Muslim communities, promotes dialogue among civilizations between the Islamic culture and other cultures. That is not to say that Fiqh of minorities is a “new” Fiqh; rather it is a specific framework/perspective of the general Fiqh that looks at the objectives and principles of Sharī‘a, relative to the reality of Muslim minorities in cases that usually only arise in situations where Muslims constitute a minority. Fiqh of minorities’ have been subjected to significant criticism, however, its advocates state that the purpose of this Fiqh is not to recreate Islam, Sharī‘a, or even Fiqh; rather it is a specialized modernist perspective of the general Fiqh that governs how a jurist might work within the flexibility of the religion to best apply it to a set of particular circumstances.¹

Although the early scholars did not recognize this Fiqh, in terms of its title, due to the absence of such phenomenon in the past, it does not mean its principles and objectives have not always been there. However, what modern scholars attempted to do is to reorganize and rearticulate these principles and objectives based on a special philosophical perspective that thoroughly considers the Western modern context where Muslims minorities live, as well as valuing the importance of the existence and coexistence in non-Muslim countries. Hence, Fiqh of minorities turns into a tool in the hands of the scholars and Muftîs to respond to these special conditions in a way that reflects the fundamental principles of Sharî’a: protection of one’s faith and identity through preserving Maslaha or public interest.

This paper argues that Fiqh of minorities’ scholars attempt to provide legal opinions and solutions for Muslim minorities in the West in order for them to fulfill their role as both good Muslims and good citizens, i.e. positive integration as they define it. The paper asks whether the cultural background of the scholar—Western/non-Western—impacts the nature of these solutions. The paper argues that Fiqh of minorities can provide two types of solutions a long-term one, for a permanent Muslim presence in the West, and a Short-term–exceptional–one, for a temporary presence. The first suggests that we are dealing with full citizens and members of the society who happen to be Muslims in religion, while the second assumes that Muslims’ natural and ultimate residence is in a Muslim majority country. Both types of solutions are reflected on the nature of the compromise Fiqh of minorities’ scholars, who in turn are affected by their own cultural backgrounds, provide to solve “the good Muslim, Good citizen equation”–i.e. whether they are perceived as “Western Muslims” or “a Muslim minority in the West”.

This study focuses on the “immigrant” element within the Muslim minority in particular. It specifically focuses on the application of Fiqh of minorities in the West. The reason for that goes back to considerable attention Muslim scholars have paid to these regions and the relation between Islam and the West. Although the latter raises more questions than offering answers, it lies outside of the scope of this study. The study is concerned with the specific relation between Fiqh of minorities and the phenomenon of the integration of such minorities. It asks the question of whether the latter Fiqh actually takes into account the conditions under which Muslim minorities live. Such issues are highly essential for both: Islamic faith and identity, and thus affect the minority’s integration process in the society. The paper proposes that Fiqh of minorities introduces a new paradigm using the notion of Umma, and its related concepts, to establish religious basis and justifications for Muslims’ positive integration in their society. Such paradigm does not only reflect the commitment to the Umma message, but also signifies the importance of all individuals practicing their own rights and fulfilling their own duties. The paper accordingly examines the impact of the context from which Fiqh of minorities’ advocates’ come—Western, non-Western, hybrid and so forth—on the final outcome of the legal opinion adopted. It highlights certain trends of thought in looking to an issue facing Muslim minorities.

Chapter one starts by asking the question of whether the immigration to a non-Muslim country is permissible in the first place. It then moves to over viewing the methodological and contextual reasons that encouraged advocates of Fiqh of minorities to introduce it. Chapter two is dedicated to Fiqh of minorities’ theory which proposes a unique interpretation of Sharî’a in an attempt to allow it to fulfill its purpose in the lives of Muslim minorities who are exposed to unique circumstances. Chapter three centers on how Fiqh of minorities theorizes for the Muslim presence in a way that enables fulfilling the “Umma message” through responding to and embracing modern concepts like citizenship and secularism, which pose restrictions and are rarely convinced with divine laws. It also exposes to different scholars’ perspectives regarding the nature of the relation between Fiqh of minorities on one side, and the Muslim identity, integration and loyalty on the other. The final chapter tries to apply the previous theory and aspirations of Fiqh of minorities’ advocates, specifically, regarding the role this Fiqh can play in the process of integration. The focus will be on two case studies: interest-based Mortgage and Islâm al-zawja. The study concludes by evaluating the status and role of Fiqh of minorities in its relation with integration through identifying the discrepancies among different scholars in perceiving such relation.
II- Muslim minorities’ need for a special Fiqh

Fiqh Al-Aqalliyyat or the jurisprudence of Muslim minorities [hereinafter Fiqh of minorities], is a legal doctrine introduced in the 1990s. This doctrine asserts that Muslim minorities, especially those residing in the West, “deserve a special new legal discipline to address their unique religious needs, which differ from those of Muslims residing in Islamic countries.” In this chapter, we will start with an overview of both the classical and modern scholars’ views and discrepancies on the position of Shari’ā regarding residency in a non-Muslim country. The latter will explore the methodological and practical reasons that encouraged advocates of Fiqh of minorities to introduce it. The chapter will then highlight several examples of the main jurisprudential issues and concerns that arise in the context of a Muslim minority living in a non-Muslim-ruled society. The chapter concludes by pointing out the main criticism the new discipline has received.

A- Arguments for and against Hijra to non-Muslim countries

Muslims, by virtue of their commitment to Islam, are expected to follow its moral imperatives as manifested in Shari’ā. Scholars, whether classical or modern, for or against Fiqh of minorities, seek evidence from Shari’ā to support their arguments. The mainstream traditional Fiqh tends to favor the opinion that while Muslims generally should not reside in non-Muslim ruled territories, it is allowed in certain cases, for instance: their inability to migrate to Muslim territories; the objective of restoring Muslim rule like in Sicily; or to spread the message of Islam. The term Hijra or immigration has been interpreted by classical Islamic scholars in different ways. Some went to favor that the only reason justifying Hijra as an obligation is to strengthen the Muslim community in its early days and in similar situations. Other scholars were more elaborate, such as Ibn al-‘arabī, who defined six situations resulting in Hijra. Three of these situations involve compulsory Hijra like in the case of Injustice or lawlessness; the remaining three involve recommended Hijra which includes “physical persecution, disease or financial insecurity. A third group of scholars showed more tolerance towards the idea of residency in a non-Muslim countries and emphasized that if Muslims were able to practice their religion then it is considered within Dâr al-islâm as long as this country does not revert into Dâr al-harb.

---

4 Id. at 88.

Thus, modern Islamic scholars mostly agree with what the classical scholars have to say regarding the conditions under which a Muslim gains permission to migrate. Nevertheless, scholars advocating Fiqh of minorities like Qaradâwî, add a modern dimension to their opinion by stating that currently many non-Muslim countries provide a liberal atmosphere in which freedom of choice, expression and practice are guaranteed. These countries like in Europe and North America, more or less, take a neutral position against religion. Qaradâwî, hence, finds it permissible for Muslims to migrate to such countries provided two conditions are met. The occurrence of a legitimate objective like searching for a job and making a living, and that such residency will not harm one’s faith and practice of religion.

Fiqh of minorities’ scholars have taken a further step towards justifying the Muslims residency in a non-Muslim country in general and in the West in particular. They cite the Emigration to Abyssinia—now Ethiopia—during the early days of Islam, when a group of Muslims took refuge there to preserve their faith. They respond to criticism, that such incidents took place when Muslims were in a weak stage, by confirming that some Muslims preferred to stay there even after Prophet Muhammad’s Hijra to Madina and the establishment of the state of Islam. Thus, Muslims are allowed to stay in a non-Muslim country and cannot be forced to leave as long as their faith is safe. They draw several conclusions from this incident: first, that Muslims can and have to plan for their presence as being permanent and plan accordingly; second, that Muslims should not limit themselves with traditional terminology that was not mentioned in Qur’ân like Dâr al-islâm, Land of Islam, and Dâr al-harb, Land of War, or Dâr al-Kufr, Land of infidelity. Rather they should embrace the idea of the universality of Islam. Third, Muslims share the duty of participating in the social and political life of their new community for various purposes

---

5 Id. at 89.
6 Id.
7 YUSUF AL QARADÂWÎ, AL WATAN WAL MUWATANA FI DAWû‘ AL OSQUL AL AQADIYYA WAL MAQÂSID AL SHAR’IYYA 63-67, Cairo, Dar Al-Shorouq (2010)[translated in the country and citizenship in lights of Islamic fundamentals and Sharî’a purposes].
9 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 7, at 69.
including: defending their rights, supporting their brothers and sisters in Islam, and fulfilling the universal message of Islam.\textsuperscript{10} Thus, \textit{Fiqh} of minorities does not only rationalize the permissibility of Muslim presence in non-Muslim countries, Rather it asserts it is an obligation towards their religion and their country provided the mentioned conditions are met.\textsuperscript{11}

\textbf{B- Methodological and contextual reasons for Fiqh of minorities}

The disagreements among early scholars, modern scholars and \textit{Fiqh} of minority scholars in the case of Muslim presence in a non-Muslim country shows that many Islamic scholars sometimes rely heavily on examples from the past that do not really match contemporary reality. This complicates the situation of Muslim minorities even more. Thus, an important conclusion made by a few researchers is that “Innovation and compromise are key concepts for Muslims trying to live Islamic lives in the context of a Judeo-Christian country.”\textsuperscript{12} That is when the calls of the establishment of a specialized Islamic jurisprudential discipline started to get louder. Though they confirm that the traditional “inherited” \textit{Fiqh} is the foundation and the main guideline,\textsuperscript{13} \textit{Fiqh} of minorities’ scholars justify the need for an allegedly new discipline by proposing both methodological and contextual rationales.

In terms of methodology, Tâha Jâbir Al-‘Alwânî elaborates that concepts like \textit{Dâr al-islâm} versus \textit{Darul or Harb}, \textit{Jizya}–\textit{Poll Tax}, rights of women, \textit{Jihâd} and other similar concepts create misconceptions, raise questions and promote stereotypes that need to be correctly approached and put in proper context. He argues that classical jurists did not classify the sources of Islamic \textit{Sharî'a} in a way that facilitates the deduction of rulings that respond to contemporary issues. In addition most jurists ignore the notion of the universality of Islam as one of the determinants to rulings and its importance in reflecting modern relation between Muslims and non-Muslims. The traditional \textit{Fiqh}, formulated in the early decades of Islam, was necessarily affected by topics and discourses which were associated with the historical and geographical circumstances that prevailed at that time.\textsuperscript{14}

\footnotesize{\begin{itemize}
    \item \textsuperscript{10} \textsc{Ashraf Abdul ‘Aatî Al-Mîmi}, \textit{Fiqh al-qâlîyyât al-muslîma bayn al-nathariyya wal tatbîq} 252-253, Dar Al-Kalima (2008).
    \item \textsuperscript{11} \textsc{Qaradâwî}, \textit{supra} note 7, at 77.
    \item \textsuperscript{12} \textit{Id.}
    \item \textsuperscript{13} Al-Mîmi, \textit{supra} note 10, at 87.
    \item \textsuperscript{14} Al-‘Alwânî, \textit{supra} note 8, at 8.
\end{itemize}}
On the other hand, when it comes to contextual reasons, ‘Alwâni counts a number of modern phenomena that in his mind call for a new specialized discipline. First, the phenomenon of seeking justice and refuge in a non-Muslim land did not exist in the early days of Fiqh. Second, the modern concept of citizenship entails political and geographic, rather than religio-cultural connotations. Third, the supremacy of international law, which obliges states to protect and apply justice to immigrants, is also new to traditional Fiqh. Fourth, the rationale of power at the early scholars’ time was based on conflict and empires knowing no frontiers, unlike the modern diplomatic and soft power predominance. Finally, globalization and the close cultural interaction urges for a Fiqh of coexistence that “suites our world in spirit and in form.”

Abd al-Majid al-Najjar further elaborates on the contextual reasons proposed by ‘Alwâni by referring to some distinctive characteristics and factors that separate Muslim minorities in the West from the rest of Muslims. In his view, the reason for the increasing attention to Muslim minorities goes back to three factors. First, the general vulnerability of Muslim minorities that can be traced back to psychological vulnerability due to cultural and social estrangement or in some cases even inferiority. In addition, there are other forms of vulnerability such as political, economic and social, which are shared among many minority groups. Second, the legal abidance that characterizes these new modern communities usually does not allow any type of personal practices or rights outside the frame of law. Thus, Muslim minorities find themselves in various occasions obliged to follow the secular rules of the country that might contradict with Sharî’a or less severely with cultural traditions. Third, there is a cultural pressure whereby Muslims may tend to live in an entirely new and different community with a totally different value system in all aspects of interaction. This unfamiliar environment subjects the original culture to pressure and conflict, which can lead to problems of assimilation and isolation. The final factor Najjar refers to as the civilizational linkage or partnership whereby Muslim minorities carry the responsibility of delivering the Islamic cultural heritage and message to these communities. Najjar argues that such factors challenge many of the premises of the earlier Fiqh. For instance, that they are not subjected to Sharî’a law which is the main foundation of classic Fiqh and thus

---

15 Id. at 8-9.
require a new type of Ijtihâd or interpretation.\textsuperscript{17} Although Tariq Ramadan disagrees with the assumption of the “Muslim weakness” proposed by Najjâr, he agrees with him that Dâr al-islâm and Dâr al-harb do not apply in today’s world.\textsuperscript{18} He also supports the argument that the entire classical Fiqh is based on the fact of Muslims being the majority.\textsuperscript{19}

While Fiqh al-Nawâzil—jurisprudence of new occurrences—is part of the general Fiqh, it still deals with partial issues which do not properly respond to major societal issues. Hence, a new discipline is needed to respond to both occasional and day-to-day issues and, more importantly, issues that found for the presence of the Muslim minorities in such communities, its purposes and conditions.\textsuperscript{20}

C- Responsible citizens or committed Muslims

Immigrant Muslims face many issues while trying to live as both responsible citizens and committed Muslims. In education, for instance, many Muslim families are concerned about the experience their children are likely have in public schools, including the quality of education or the influence of their, likely non-Muslim, peers concerning mainly drugs, crime and premarital sex.\textsuperscript{21} For these reasons, many Muslims tend to believe that an Islamic system of education suites their children better.

Another obvious aspect has to do with controversial issues regarding finance and economics which can be a problem for Muslims dealing with non-Muslim banking and economic system. Whether the money a Muslim earns from a bank is Harâm—unlawful—or not, is a huge issue among Muslim minorities. The level of flexibility of interpretations of Islamic Sharî’a regarding this matter vary. Conflict often arises when the issue of interest—arguably a form of the unlawful usury in Islam—affects Muslims through, for instance, interest-based mortgages in buying property, or whether their money, saved in banks, is going to be invested in alcohol, pornography and other questionable industries. To avoid such concerns, Muslims seek alternative solutions through avenues such as investment clubs,\textsuperscript{22} Murâbaha,\textsuperscript{23} and others. Though some extreme voices argue that the “American Umma” must have its own treasury, most of the inclinations are to find middle ground solutions within the existing economy.\textsuperscript{24}

\textsuperscript{18} Hellyer, supra note 3, at 11.

\textsuperscript{20} Nâjîr, supra note 17, at 99-102.

Another common issue is concerned with Nutrition and Health. Probably the obvious concern among Muslims is the prohibition of certain nutritional habits such as pork and alcohol. Recently more attention has been given to the proper ritual slaughter of edible animals known as Hâlal food.\textsuperscript{25} Hâlal food has gained more popularity with time. However, the impact of nutritional habits prevails other occasions when some Muslims, for instance, refuse to attend ceremonies or events that serve alcoholic beverages. Some simply abstain from drinking alcohol itself leaving others to make their own decisions. The issue of whether a Muslim may work in a place that serves alcohol is forbidden or not is another controversial issue. Here again responses differ, ranging from conditional acceptance to utter rejection.\textsuperscript{26}

Socializing and holidays, whether Islamic or not, is another area of concern to Muslim minorities. A Muslim woman clarified “we celebrate Christmas for two reasons, it is important to get involved with the American society, and if you don’t celebrate . . . to me really you are telling those people you are not part of American society.”\textsuperscript{27} On the other hand, some Muslims tend to see the Fourth of July as a chance to affirm their civic participation and engagement with the society. Similarly, Halloween to most of them seems rather harmless as well.\textsuperscript{28}

In addition to problems concerning education, economics, nutrition and holidays, personal problems must be considered as well. Most of the personal problems that face Muslims have to do with their attempt to balance the requirements of their faith with expectations of American society. Examples of such problems include whether a Muslim should accept a gift from a non-

\textsuperscript{22} Id. at 166.
\textsuperscript{23} A concept found in Islamic finance that governs a contract between a bank and its client, by which the bank purchases goods and then sells them to the client at a cost that includes a profit margin. The contract requires specific installment payments to the bank. This arrangement allows the bank to avoid charging interest, which is forbidden under some interpretations of Islamic law. For more information See, Webster’s New World Finance and Investment Dictionary, available at: http://www.credoreference.com.library.aucegypt.edu:2048/entry/wileynwfid/murabaha (Last visited May, 12, 2012).
\textsuperscript{24} See generally, SMITH, supra note 21, at 166-167.
\textsuperscript{25} Id.
\textsuperscript{26} Id. at 169.
\textsuperscript{27} S\textsc{elc}uk R. S\textsc{irin} & M\textsc{ich}elle F\textsc{ine}, M\textsc{uslim} A\textsc{merican} Y\textsc{outh}: \textit{U}nderstanding H\textsc{y}phenated I\textsc{dentities} through m\textsc{ultiple} m\textsc{ethods} 170 (New York University Press) (2008).
\textsuperscript{28} Id.
Muslim, or attend funerals, weddings and other forms of events of non-Muslims. Relating to that are the family law issues especially marriage to non-Muslims, conversion, and adoption must also be dealt with.

The most crucial issue, however, has to do with the validity and permissibility of Muslims, especially immigrants, residing in a non-Muslim community at all and whether it is acceptable in Islamic Shari‘a and under which conditions. Obtaining the nationality of such an “infidel” country and thus possessing the right of voting and political participation in a non-Muslim regime and the duty of obligatory army recruitment especially when there is a confrontation with another Muslim country must all be considered.

Now that we have covered the reasons behind the calls for a new discipline of Fiqh and consolidated it by examples of jurisprudential issues that face Muslims as minorities we turn to the criticism that has been directed to such a called-for discipline.

D- Criticism: Fiqh of minorities... an innovation?

Fiqh of minorities defends the necessity and not just the permissibility, of Muslims residing in a non-Muslim country. This point has been subjected to considerable criticism. For instance, scholars, like sheikh Mohamed Saeed Ramadan al-Buti, are utterly against the concept of a new discipline for minorities. Buti believes it is merely a plot to divide Islam and a means to manipulate divine Shari‘a.*

Proponents argue that Fiqh of minorities is a reflection of a mentality dominated by the Western capitalist ideology and its utilitarian solutions. He emphasizes that immigration from Dâr al-Kufr is an obligation on Muslims and he supports his argument with some Qur’ânic verses.* He further contends that because of Fiqh of minorities, Muslim minorities are in fact assimilating in these non-Muslim communities and adopting their traditions and life-styles that contradict with Islamic faith and Shari‘a. What

---

31 For instance “When angels take the souls of those who die in sin against their souls, they say: “In what –plight– were ye?” They reply: “Weak and oppressed were we in the earth.” They say: “Was not the earth of Allâh spacious enough for you to move yourselves away –From evil–?” Such men will find their abode in Hell, - What an evil refuge!” (Qur’ân 4:97)
Fiqh of minorities is doing, in his point of view, is giving this unacceptable life style an Islamic cover and justification.\(^{32}\)

Asif Khan, on the other hand, is more systematic in his criticism. He identifies two main categories of criticism to the pillars of Fiqh of minorities. First, he refutes the need for a new specialized Fiqh for minorities in the first place as traditional Fiqh includes all answers without the need to commit Harām—forbidden. Second, he refutes the justifications and means for public participation and integration provided by Fiqh of minorities’ scholars. In his view, issues facing Muslim minorities are complex but are not unique; they are common problems among Muslims across the world.\(^{33}\)

Regarding the needs for a new Fiqh, he responds to the claim that Shari’a has stayed silent on some issues especially new ones. He bases his argument on the verse “And We have sent down to you the Book—the Qur’ân—as an exposition of everything, a guidance, a mercy, and glad tidings of those who have submitted for those who have submitted themselves to Allâh.”\(^{34}\) As for the claim that Islam changes from time to time and from place to place he asserts that the laws that are subjected to change are not the Shari’a ones, rather what is meant are the laws based on customs, habit—‘Urf—and Juristic opinions—Ra’y—that were based on the prevailing opinions at the time. He finally responds to the concept of reworking the question in a way that reflects reality and need. He refers to it as a pragmatic manipulative method that will eventually lead to evil—Munkar.\(^{35}\)

In his second category of criticism where he criticizes the pillars of political participation and integration claimed by advocates of Fiqh of minorities, he refutes the validity of some evidences provided to justify civic and social engagement. For instance he challenges the definition of Maslaha—benefit—in the assumption that one of the Maqāsid—purposes—of Shari’a is “benefit”—which is a central pillar to Fiqh of minorities. He explains that Maqāsid are the results and not the reasons for Shari’a rules. Thus, the wisdom and the Maqāsid of the Shari’a rule are aims sought by the law giver—Allâh and consequently are insufficient for justifying a certain action.\(^{36}\)

\(^{32}\) Buti, supra note 29.

\(^{34}\) Qur’ân 16:89.

\(^{35}\) KHAN, supra note 33, at16.

\(^{36}\) See generally, Id. at 28-30.
Citizenship is another core concept in the theory of Fiqh of minorities that is challenged by Khan, where he argues that it cannot, as defined by Fiqh of minorities’ scholars, serve as a justification for political participation because by subjecting to rules and laws entailed in citizenship we are making it a source of legislation that takes precedence over Sharî’a. This contradicts the core of Islam.\(^{37}\)

Criticism to Fiqh of minorities’ theory is directed towards its premises, methodology and even purposes—integration included. Advocates of Fiqh of minorities respond by refuting that the latter is anything but Bid’a—innovation—because early Fiqh writings are filled with rulings of Muslims living in Dâr al-harb. Thus, even though the terminology Fiqh of minorities is new, it serves more as an organizational tool to modern scholars using mainly classic rules and methodologies. They also emphasize not to confuse Sharî’a and Fiqh. Relating to the issue of citizenship raised by Khan, Nadia Mustafa, on the other side, summarizes the main issue Fiqh of minorities tries to resolve to be: identifying the position of religion between citizenship and identity.\(^ {38}\) Here, comes the role of Fiqh of minorities with its philosophy and objectives. The next chapter explores what exactly Fiqh of minorities is and what it is comprised of. It also provides answers to the points of criticism raised in this chapter.

\(^{37}\) Id. at 33.

\(^{38}\) MUSTAVA, supra note 16, at 51.
III- Theoretical Framework of Fiqh of Minorities

This chapter is dedicated to Fiqh of minorities’ theory which proposes a unique interpretation of Shari‘a in an attempt to fulfill its purpose in the lives of Muslim minorities who are exposed to unique circumstances. Islamic law is understood in two forms, Shari‘a and Fiqh. Shari‘a relates to the primary sources of Islamic law and is drawn from both Qur‘ān and Sunna—the Prophets traditions. However, when specific issues arise that are not directly covered in the two latter sources, one is to use reason to deduce the principles on how Shari‘a would apply and this process is called Ijtihād, which literally means “to exert oneself.” Fiqh, on the other side, means intelligence. It represents the actual laws deduced to form Shari‘a, and thus, it covers all legal issues concerning religious, political, civil and criminal matters, as well as other aspects of life. These laws of Fiqh can change depending on the circumstances, whereas the principles of Shari‘a are considered monolithic and constant.

Fiqh can be understood as the process of deducing and applying the principles of Shari‘a. The process of Fiqh is divided into two parts. Usûl al-Fiqh, or the roots, which is the methodology and interpretation principles used in determining the law; and Furû‘ al-Fiqh, or the branches, which is the practice of law and deals with the actual decisions or verdicts—Fatāwâ, reached by applying Usûl al-Fiqh. Hence, Tâha Jâbir Al-‘Alwânî introduces the need for Fiqh of minorities by arguing that the special circumstances of Muslim minorities has to be put into consideration, [T]he idea that the Muslim Jurist must relate the general Islamic jurisprudence to the specific circumstances of a specific community, living in specific circumstances where what is suitable for them may not be suitable for others . . . jurist must not only have a strong background in Islamic sciences, but must also be well versed in the sociology, economics, politics, and international relations relating to that community . . . [the purpose of Fiqh of minorities is not to] recreate Islam, rather it is a set of methodologies that govern how a jurist would work within the flexibility of the religion to best apply it to particular circumstances.

Thus, Fiqh of minorities not only concerned with Islamic studies but other areas of knowledge important to understanding the characteristics and the pressing needs of the society in order to

---

40 Id.
41 Id. at 516.
42 KHAN, supra note 33, at 6.
issue a verdict that responds to the objectives of the Islamic Shari’a in its solutions for the Muslim minorities as well.

A- Position and Sources of Fiqh of minorities

Fiqh of minorities does not mean that it is the Fiqh of minor issues—a mere branch of general Fiqh. Rather it should come under the science of Fiqh in its general sense and thus covers all theological and practical branches of Islamic jurisprudence. Fiqh of minorities is a qualitative jurisprudence that relates the Shari’a ruling to the conditions and the context of the group. It is still part of the general Fiqh but has special characteristics, topics, and issues of concern. Most of these are known in classic jurisprudence but under different scattered titles. These special topics focus specifically on issues affecting Muslim minorities who endeavor both to preserve their faith and their identity and interact with their society at the same time. It is a similar category to Usûl al-Fiqh—Fiqh of foundations, Fiqh al-Awlawiyyât—priorities, Fiqh al-Muwâzanât—contrasts, Fiqh al-Wâqi’—reality and Fiqh al-Nawâzîl—New occurrences.

Particularly, Ḥalâl al-Shâbâni argues that originally, Fiqh of minorities was an evolution of Fiqh al-Nawâzîl that dealt with brand new issues. However, he points out that the new discipline tries to overcome the temporary and negative impressions and connotations Fiqh al-Nawâzîl leaves. The methodological and contextual reasons, mentioned in chapter one, encouraged Fiqh of minorities’ scholars and affiliated institutions, like the European council for fatwa and research [hereinafter ECFR], to start the process of developing a methodology for this new discipline. Their aim was not only to create a simple system of answering personal questions in jurisprudence but a framework for political and social interaction between Muslims and non-Muslims as well.

ECFR agrees with Fiqh of minorities’ advocates on using the authentic classical sources of Shari’a as the basis of their theory and framework, but in an innovative and specialized manner.

---

43 Ḥalâl al-Shâbâni, supra note 8, at 6.
44 AL-MIMI, supra note 10, at 80.
45 Ḥalâl al-Shâbâni, supra note 8, at 16.
46 Personal Interview with Ṭāḥa Ǧabīr Ḥalâl al-Shâbâni, Qordoba center for research and studies, Cairo (Feb 2, 2012) [hereinafter ‘Alwânî interview] (refer to the annex).
47 Fishman, supra note 2, at 5
Moreover, they acknowledge the supremacy of the Qur’ān as the main source. ‘Alwânî explains that Qur’ān is considered the foundational source for all other sources, including early scholars’ ijtihād, and consequently should be the original source of all rules and verdicts. Sunna, in turn, is the explanatory source of Qur’ān that can only be interpreted and understood in light of the latter. ‘Alwânî believes that no tradition can be tracked to the Prophet unless it has an origin in the Qur’ān. As for the classic jurisprudential opinions, they are considered supporting or complementary sources that should not be ignored nor viewed as a restraint. Fiqh of minorities’ advocates depends frequently on certain tools found in the traditional Fiqh methodology, namely, ijtihād, maslaha–public interest or benefit, taysîr–Making Fiqh easy, and ‘urf–custom.

The purpose of Fiqh of minorities is not to recreate Islam, Shari‘a, or even Fiqh; rather it is a specialized modernist perspective of the general Fiqh that governs how a jurist may work within the flexibility of the religion to best apply it to a set of particular circumstances. Although the early scholars did not recognize this Fiqh as such due to the absence of such phenomenon in the past, it does not mean its principles and objectives have not always been there. However, what modern scholars have attempted to do is to reorganize and rearticulate these principles and objectives based on a special philosophical perspective that thoroughly considers the Western modern context where Muslims minorities live, as well as valuing the importance of the existence and coexistence in non-Muslim countries. Hence, Fiqh of minorities turns into a tool in the hands of the scholars and Muftîs or jurists to respond to these special conditions in a way that reflects the fundamental principles of Shari‘a: protection of one’s faith/identity through preserving maslaha. An important prerequisite for the Fiqh of minorities’ scholar is to be more 48 See Yusuf al-Qaradāwî, Fi Fiqh Al Aqalîyyat Al Muslimah, Hayat Al Muslimin Wasat Al Muitama’at Al Ukhra 39, Cairo, Dar Al-Shorouq (2001) [translated in the Fiqh of Muslim Minorities, the life of Muslims in other communities]; and ‘Alwânî, supra note 8, at 12.

50 See Qaradâwî, supra note 48, at 39 and id.

51 Id.

52 Al-Mimî, supra note 10, at 84.

53 Fishman, supra note 2, at 8.

specialized in the areas of social sciences and economics and their sciences while extracting the appropriate opinions and verdicts from the general Fiqh.

Most concepts and issues of Fiqh of minorities have always existed within Sharī‘a and general Fiqh but lack the necessary organization, details and renovation in the process of Ijtihād that is required to appropriately answer to the targeted phenomenon. This reflects the view that Sharī‘a is suitable for every time and place while verdict is subject to change. The resulting Verdicts from Fiqh of minorities, however, are not necessarily exclusive to the case of minorities and can be applied to other cases but on different bases and reasons. The reason it is labeled as Fiqh of minorities goes back to “the reason” why the scholar has issued this Verdict—which is argued to be the philosophy of integration that entails both Da‘wa and preserving the identity. The latter requires the scholar to be an expert in real life issues and circumstances faced by Muslims and not just abstractions.

B- Objectives of Fiqh of minorities

Advocates of Fiqh of minorities recognize the importance of preserving Islamic faith and identity while endorsing Muslim minorities’ presence in non-Muslim communities. As noted in chapter one they contend that such presence is an obligation and not just permissible. Reasons of the nature of such presence can be interpreted from the objectives of Fiqh of minorities pointed out by different scholars. Qaradāwī, for instance, sets objectives that include supporting Muslim minorities and facilitating their living within the Islamic framework while making life easier on them; helping to preserve the core of Islamic identity with its unique culture, values traditions and concepts and educating such minority about its rights and duties in its new society; providing flexibility, guided openness, and interaction with other members of society, which consequently encourages positive contribution within such society, without the previously mention isolation or assimilation; and answering to the special circumstances and problems in a non-Muslim society in an attempt to alleviate difficulty.\(^{55}\) Thus, the objectives, as set by Qaradāwī,\(^{56}\) revolve around supporting and empowering Muslims, preserving identity, facilitating living within Sharī‘a framework, delivering the message of Islam, whether cultural or \(^{55}\) Qaradāwī, supra note 48, at 34-35.

\(^{56}\) Copied by others; See, Al-Mimi, supra note 10, at 81-82.
religious–Da’wa–directly or indirectly, and finally promoting a positive interaction and coexistence through educating Muslim minorities about their rights and duties as citizens.

Recalling the methodological and contextual reasons that lead to calls for a new discipline, Fiqh of minorities is designed to respond to such reasons. Methodologically, it tries to resolve the conflict between the culture and values of host societies from within the framework of Islamic jurisprudence. It aims at reshaping and reinterpreting engrained Islamic concepts such as Dār al-islām and Dār al-Kufr. On the other hand, Contextually, as Najjār states, the reason why the ECFR, which adopts Fiqh of minorities as a policy, was established is to provide a guide for Muslim minorities for their own, as well as their community’s benefit in order for them to serve as a role model.

Thus, one can count common objectives and intentions among scholars of Fiqh of minorities. The first is attracting more Muslims to follow Shari’ā instead of assimilating and losing both faith and identity. Second, it is not only a jurisprudential legal system, but a tool for increasing social bonds and political influence and even unity among Muslim minorities within their non-Muslim society. Third, it tries to establish a platform for peaceful coexistence with non-Muslims through providing effective solutions to reconcile Islam with the secularist West without moving outside the boundaries of Shari’ā. This last objective reflects the concept of Shahâda or witnessing whereby Muslims are obliged to serve as role models within their community wherever that is. Such Shahâda is the flip coin of the concept of Da’wa–propagating the message of Islam, which will be discussed later in more detail.

C- Characteristics of Fiqh of minorities

The reason for identifying the characteristics of Fiqh of minorities is to lay down the regulations and criteria that control the process of Ijtihâd–an integral element to the framework of Fiqh of minorities. Qaradâwî asserts that in order for it to fulfill its objectives; Fiqh of minorities must be characterized by linking and balancing the general principles and foundations of traditional Fiqh at one hand and the contemporary issues and problems on the others; reflecting the 57 Fishman, supra note 2, at 1.

58 Najjâr, supra note 10, at 3.
59 Fishman, supra note 2, at 14.

17
universality of the Islamic belief, law and the current social realities, where it tries to provide solutions for the latter from within the Islamic legal framework as not to contradict the proper Islamic faith; Third, Balancing between partial Sharī’a texts and general objectives of Sharī’a, i.e. returns the branches to its roots and bypasses the particularities to the collective; Fourth, Recognizes that Fatwa—religious verdict—varies according to time, place, traditions and circumstances, a thing that cannot apply more in the case of Muslim minorities in modern era; and Finally, valuing the idea that one should balance between his/her distinct cultural and religious identity on one side and integrating, influencing and communicating with his/her current society on the other.61

The process of Ijtihâd in Fiqh of minorities’ framework is based on two main premises that can be extrapolated from the preceding characteristics: universality of Islam—‘Alamiyyat al-Islâm—and the objectives of Sharī’a—Maqāsid al-Sharī’a.62 The first premise reflects the idea that Islam is a global religion. This definition carries implicit messages one of which is linked to the Muslim Umma and the future of Islam beyond the current borders.63 This message does not necessarily imply the direct message of spreading the faith in the same sense of the missionaries. Rather it is more reflected in the indirect message of turning into a role model—Shahâda—for humanity and for their community. Such concept of universality stresses on the fact that verdict changes from time to time and from place to another, which is a core characteristic in Fiqh of minorities. It also reflects the necessity of one’s responsibility towards his or her community in all aspects whether political, economic or social as long as they preserve and add to their Muslim-Western identity. Salah Sultan states that “the Ijtihâd in the field of Fiqh of Muslim Minorities must emphasize the Muslim’s role in reforming his or her country and community rather than being limited to the Fiqh of protection against temptations and tribulations,”64 otherwise it will not achieve “the whole message of Islam nor the entire role entitled for Muslims [which is] to benefit oneself . . . and to prove oneself useful to his community or country whether it was good or bad.”65

61 Id.
62 Fishman, supra note 2, at 2.
63 Id. at 3.
64 Sultan, supra note 60.
65 Id.
The second premise which recognizes Maqāsid al-Shari'a or the ultimate intentions of Shari'a will not take place without combining the understanding of revealed text with reality–context–as well as acquiring a true knowledge of Shari'a. Such is achieved only through recognizing certain methodological principles. ‘Alwâni stresses on specific characteristics necessary for Fiqh of minorities in order for it to fulfill the intended Maqāsid: unveiling the structural unity of Qur’ân by reading it in contrast to the physical universe; studying very closely the complicated aspects of the lives of people from which the issues and problems of Muslim minorities arise; and most importantly to recognize that the inherited Fiqh from classic scholars is not always an adequate reference for verdict in matters of minorities. “It does however, contain precedents of Verdicts and legislations than can be applied and referred to for determining approaches and methodologies as appropriate.66 Qaradâwî concurs by differentiating between selective Ijtihād–where modern scholars pick and choose from the inherited Ijtihād and opinions the best that respond to the context as well as the Maqāsid; and creative Ijtihād–that mostly deals with new occurrences that are almost impossible to find answers for in inherited Fiqh.67 While the notion of ‘Alamiyyat al-Islâm sets justifications and foundations for the permanent Muslim presence in a non-Muslim regime,68 the other notion of Maqāsid al-Shari’a enables jurists to adapt integral concepts such as Darûra–necessity, Taysîr–leniency, and Maslaha–benefit–to Fiqh of minorities. The significance and implications of such concepts will become apparent when we turn to the application of Fiqh of minorities in the final chapter.

D- Principles and Foundations of Fiqh of minorities

Fiqh of minorities’ jurists must consider certain factors when formulating a legal opinion. First, the field of Fiqh should depend on modernist Ijtihād, which responds to objectives and purposes of Shari’a. Here, Qaradâwî identifies two types of Ijtihād: selective and creative.69 Second, depending and putting into consideration the general rules of Islamic law. Most importantly: matters are to be considered in light of their objectives; harm should be removed; customary usage is the determining factor; the presence of difficulty requires that allowances be made to facilitate matters; what is established with certainty is not removed by doubt; what is necessary

66 ‘Alwâni, supra note 8, at 12.
67 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 43.
68 Fishman, supra note 2, at 2.
69 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 40.
to achieve an obligation is obligatory; what leads to Harâm is also Harâm; and the Lesser of the two evils.\textsuperscript{70} Najjâr pays extra attention to the rule that matters are to be determined by their objectives.\textsuperscript{71} The ultimate purpose of identifying such jurisprudential rules is to fulfill Maqqasid which are the deduced meanings and consequential objectives attempted to be accomplished by the jurisprudential rules found in sources of Shari‘a. All of this tracks back to the ultimate objective of achieving monotheism or the oneness of Allâh along with fulfilling Maslaha of Muslims.\textsuperscript{72}

The thirds consideration is that jurists must put into consideration the jurisprudence of current reality–Fiqh al-Wâqi‘. This implies factual not just theoretical observation of the conditions, its necessities and obligations.\textsuperscript{73} Here the principle that a verdict varies according to time, place, and circumstances is essential. Moreover, Fiqh of minorities, in applying the concept of Waqi‘–reality, adopts the vision of the importance of peaceful coexistence between Muslims and non-Muslims in their shared community. Muslims are obliged in Qur‘ân to involve and interact with people of other faiths. The nature of such interaction revolves around two interrelated concepts: being a role model and Da‘wa.\textsuperscript{74} Such approach evolves eventually into fulfilling the idea of citizenship and its entailed rights and duties.\textsuperscript{75}

Fourth, is to focus on the jurisprudence of the group not merely individuals. In other words, focus on the identity as a group that shares common characteristics, issues and situations on regular basis.\textsuperscript{76} Thus, bypassing the mere principle of al-Darûrât Tubîh al-Mahzûrât–necessities allow the Prohibited–[hereinafter the principle of Darûra] which implies that the derived verdict is a temporary license into establishing a permanent Islamic presence.\textsuperscript{77} Fifth, is to adopt a methodology of Taysîr or facilitation and the tendency to ease up on Muslims.\textsuperscript{78} Based on the aforementioned principle which indicates that the presence of difficulty requires that allowances be made to facilitate matters, Fiqh of minorities’ advocates adopt such methodology \textsuperscript{70} For further details See, General Principles of Islamic Law & Their Practical Applications for Medicine, available at: http://islamtoday.com/artshow-385-3398.htm (Last visited Nov. 13, 2011).

\textsuperscript{71} NAIJÂR, supra note17, at 147.

\textsuperscript{72} Al-MIMI, supra note 10, at 121.

\textsuperscript{73} Id. at 199.

\textsuperscript{74} Al-MIMI, supra note 10, at 227.

\textsuperscript{75} Id. at 237.

\textsuperscript{76} QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at.

\textsuperscript{77} ‘Alwânî interview, supra note 46.

\textsuperscript{78} Id. at 40-45.
in perceiving reality and interpreting verdicts. Such principle is the flip coin of the principle of Darūra. Fiqh of minorities responds to criticism by identifying what exactly is meant by Darūra or difficulty and when such principles apply. Scholars differentiate between bearable and unbearable difficulty.\(^{79}\) They also set very tight conditions under which the principle of Darūra applies. They also identify how this principle is applied according to different circumstances.\(^{80}\)

The notion of Taysîr leads necessarily to the sixth concept which implies gradualism not just an Islamic principle but a universal characteristic. The special conditions Muslim minorities are in calls for such gradualism.\(^{81}\) Finally, in addition to Fiqh al-Wâqi‘, Fiqh of minorities puts into consideration other types of Fiqh, namely,\(^ {82}\) Fiqh al-Muwâzanât—balancing between good, less good, evil and most evil while applying jurisprudential rules and principles in reality; and Fiqh al-Awlawiyyât—arranging issues based on their priority while trying to reach a verdict.

In conclusion, Fiqh of minorities is viewed by its founders and defenders not merely as a simple system for answering personal questions in jurisprudence, but as a Shari‘a-based framework for political and social interaction between Muslim minorities and non-Muslim majority.\(^ {83}\) Thus, based on this branch of Fiqh, when a question is raised, its practitioners need to identify the special circumstances and put it in a logical and scientific framework that takes into consideration the background of the query, the inquirer, the underlying social factors and the essential objectives of Islamic law.\(^ {84}\) Hence, the issue depends a lot on “how to phrase the questions accurately so as to elicit appropriate and correct answers . . . [in addition to] highlight[ing] the elements that shape the question.”\(^ {85}\)

Accordingly, a question that asks about the possibility of Muslim minorities’ participation in the political life of a host non-Muslim country/legal system should be rephrased and restructured to question Islam’s view regarding a group of Muslims who find themselves living among a non-Muslim majority whose system allows them to practice their faith and moreover, participate in public life. Should such a minority reject such an opportunity for fear of assimilation or \(^{79}\) Al-Mîmî, supra note 10, at 284.

\(^{80}\) For further details see, id. at 90.

\(^{81}\) Qârâdâwî, supra note 48, at 55.

\(^{82}\) Al-Mîmî, supra note 10, at 319.

\(^{83}\) Fishman, supra note 2, at 3.

\(^{84}\) Alwânî, supra note 8, at 21-21.

\(^{85}\) Id. at 12.
influence? The question when phrased this way reflects a sense of responsibility instead of merely seeking a license to justify a negative situation.

Finally, any legislation whether divine or secular has its impact on its own culture. Similarly, “culture stems from Fiqh and the laws that govern society.” The following chapter explores the how Fiqh of minorities’ advocates and scholars view the role it can play in the lives of Muslim minorities and whether it serves the purpose of integration while preserving Muslim’s cultural and religious identity.

---

86 ld. at 13.
87 ld. at 31.
IV- Fiqh of Minorities and Integration

Because of the all-encompassing nature of Shari’a in Muslims’ lives, scholars have always strove to respond to Muslim minorities’ issues in terms of special cases and emergencies which required Rukhas and Darûra–Licenses and necessity situations.\(^8\) This perspective promotes a temporary conception to the situation of such minorities which has led many to doubt the ability of Muslims to integrate into non-Muslim societies. It was not until the emergence of Fiqh of minorities in its modern interpretation and analysis did scholars start to theorize for Muslims as permanent citizens with rights and duties in their hosting community. In other words, it was the beginning of an era of theorizing for a Western Islam not just a series of exceptional verdicts and licenses with regards to the temporary presence in a non-Muslim community. It does not contradict with the fact that Muslims all over the world belong to the Islamic Umma and are committed to its civilizational and religious purpose.

The focus of this chapter centers on how Fiqh of minorities theorizes the Muslim presence in a way that enables fulfilling this “Umma message” through responding to and embracing modern concepts like citizenship and secularism, which pose restrictions and are rarely supportive of divine laws. The argument in this paper is that Fiqh of minorities introduces a new paradigm using the notion of Umma, and its related concepts, to establish religious basis and justifications for Muslims’ positive integration in their society. Such paradigm does not only reflect the commitment to the Umma message, but also signifies the importance of all individuals practicing their own rights and fulfilling their own duties. However, in order to analyze how Fiqh of minorities’ advocates view the role of this Umma in the context of Muslim minorities, specifically in the area of integration, we have to determine first what these scholars meant by integration. We will then move to exploring different academic and theoretical contributions regarding the relation between Fiqh of minorities and the concepts of integration, loyalty and citizenship.

\(^{88}\) NAJJÂR, supra note 17, at 131.
A- Integration

Integration is often identified as a healthy middle ground between total assimilation and total isolation. It is the positive interaction and contribution with the new society by which the immigrant cultural identity constitutes an addition to the whole society and has no significant impact on the immigrant’s sense of belonging to his or her new society. That is to say that Integration is positive for both the immigrant and the society than assimilation and isolation, as the immigrant participates in the new culture while maintaining his/her own cultural identity. Concepts of adaptation and absorption within the new society, requires the cultural integration process to be accomplished as a two-way process: from the immigrants’ perspective and from the immigrant-receiving societies’ perspective.

Advocates of Fiqh of minorities share a similar definition of integration to the one above. Qaradâwî recognizes that Muslim minorities are part of the Islamic Umma and at the same time part of their society. Thus, both sides should be considered and balanced. When tracking the objectives of Fiqh of minorities, he counts preserving the core or the identity of the Islamic personality as an objective. It is followed by the objective of guided openness that rejects isolation and assimilation, where Muslim minorities are obliged to fulfill their roles and responsibilities in their community in the best way. While introducing the concept of civilizational partnership between Muslims and non-Muslims, Najjâr maps for the definition of integration. For individuals to create a community there has to be a level of integration between them, which represents the interaction among them that leads to psychological, social, economic, and political homogeneity. They have to share common interests and common conception regarding their legal systems and social rules as well. Such integration does not imply producing exact copies of individuals, rather differences among individuals enriches the community. Positive integration is accomplished when they share a common goal of developing and benefitting their community as well as declaring allegiance to such entity. He adds that if Muslim minorities lived a true Islamic life and fulfilled the Umma objectives they should be contributing to their community and its value system. ‘Alwânî, on the other side, introduces

---

90 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 36-37.
91 NAJJÂR, supra note 17, at 39-40.
the concept of peaceful coexistence; Muslims should not withdraw from proactive interaction with the environment he or she lives in. otherwise it would be a contradiction to the principles advanced by Qur’ân\(^{92}\) that calls for affirmative and constructive engagement.\(^{93}\)

Noting how \textit{Fiqh} of minorities’ scholars have defined integration, one can conclude that they view positive integration as comprising two main factors: preserving the identity and promoting a responsible citizenship, which in turn entails responsibilities, rights and duties towards the community. Citizenship, in turn, is a “voluntary bond joined within national horizons and ruled by a constitution.”\(^{94}\) Such bond is strengthened by feelings of allegiance, mutual recognition and tolerance among the society’s members regardless of their differences or origins.

Before we explore and analyze how \textit{Fiqh} of minorities’ advocates view the relation between the latter \textit{Fiqh}, integration and, consequently, its entailed concepts—relation with non-Muslims, citizenship, and loyalty, we will explore briefly the work of two intellectuals, Nadia Mustafa\(^{95}\) and Andrew March.\(^{96}\) Both provide an essential foundation for the relation between the proposed \textit{Umma} concept, \textit{Fiqh} of minorities and where the positions of integration and citizenship are found between them.

\textbf{B- \textit{Fiqh} of minorities and integration: between Da‘wa and Umma}

While March suggests a reading where the concept of \textit{Da‘wa} is the main link justifying the relation between \textit{Fiqh} of minorities and integration, Nadia Mustafa adopts a wider view. She considers \textit{Da‘wa} as one of the main pillars forming the nature and the message of the Islamic \textit{Umma}. In this paper’s view, her idea responds to the latter relation in a more comprehensive way than March.

\(^{92}\) (Qur’ân 42:39) (”And those who avenge themselves when tyranny is incurred upon them help and defend themselves”).

\(^{93}\) Alwâni, supra note8, at 15.

\(^{94}\) Andrew F. March, \textit{Sources of Moral Obligation to non-Muslims in the Jurisprudence of Muslim Minorities (Fiqh al-Aqalyyat)} Discourse 48, 16 \textit{ISLAMIC LAW AND SOCIETY} 34, 48 (2009).

\(^{95}\) Nadia Mustafa, Director of the Center for Research and Policy Studies program and the supervisor of the dialogue of civilizations center, faculty of economics and political science, Cairo University.

\(^{96}\) Andrew F. March, Department of Political Science, Yale University.
1- March and the concept of Da’wa

His main argument contends that Fiqh of minorities is an attempt to provide an Islamic foundation for a moral obligation and solidarity with non-Muslims. The reasons behind the need for revisiting the nature of moral relations with non-Muslims goes back to two main factors: the global trends towards equality in citizenship and human rights; and the large scale of migration of Muslims to the West which increased interaction and subjected Muslims to Western legal system. He states that the main basis for theorizing Fiqh of minorities is the concept of Da’wa or proselytism. He identifies three main sources that justify moral obligation to non-Muslims: Shari’a Text; legitimate contracts; and public interest—Maslaha. He concludes that the concept of Da’wa finds basis in these three sources and that:

Along with contract, Da’wa is the core Islamic concept at the heart of the project to theorize the legitimacy of permanent Muslim citizenship in non-Muslim liberal democracies. . . It allows scholars who might otherwise be skeptical about voluntary integration into a non-Muslim culture . . . to proclaim life in the West to be not only permissible, but also spiritually meaningful and beneficial to the Islamic movement. He interprets the notion of citizenship by elaborating the importance of attitudes of solidarity among fellow citizens which cannot take place except through recognition. The same modern definition entails a reciprocal relationship between individuals living within geographic borders that do not necessarily share decent, religion or even collective memory, but so share same rights and duties. It is “a voluntary bond joined within national horizons and ruled by a constitution.”Da’wa, which represents the basic justification of relation with non-Muslims in Islamic jurisprudence, shares in its theory factors of recognition, tolerance, and voluntary bond through its meta-ethical approach and communication with non-Muslims. Moreover, “Da’wa is not merely motivated by the aim of winning adherents to one’s way of life, but rather by a desire to extend a good to others unconditionally.” March goes on to explore the characteristic of Islamic Da’wa and how they respond to the concept of recognitions which is essential to citizenship and thus integration. He suggests that Fiqh of minorities, by elaborating on Da’wa, attempts to go beyond the importance of contract to create a thicker form of obligation towards non-Muslims which involves recognition to non-Muslims and contributing to

---

98 Id. at 36.
99 Id. at 48.
100 Id. at 49.
their well-being. The higher aim of Da’wa is, in turn, Mercy upon all mankind, Muslim or non-Muslim. In Mawlawi’s words, “... there can and must be affection and love towards a person whom you wish to call to God.”\(^{101}\) Other scholars elaborate that Da’wa does not take place only through direct call to God, it includes also another factor: Shahâda.

According to March, Da’wa, through its values of good will, transparency, honesty, sincerity, reason, freedom of choice, non-coercion, patience, openness to getting to know the other and respect for all, leads to recognition which creates the mutual bonds required for a full citizenship and thus, opens the door to integration. For him Da’wa is the common theme among all Fiqh of minorities’ scholars and, thus, integration serves as a means to fulfill it.

2- Mustafa and the Umma

The term Umma, though differing from the modern definition, is commonly translated as “nation”. It is used by Islamists to refer to a body comprises of all Muslims wherever they may be.\(^{102}\) Nadia Mustafa defines the Umma as a group of people who share belonging and allegiance to a common perception to life and seek its promotion and serving its purposes.\(^{103}\) In this sense, Umma is a civilizational doctrinal entity that is not bound to time and place. The role of this Umma as defined by Mustafa as: promoting the presence of such entity in reality to be able to fulfill the other two purposes; empowering Muslims and the Islamic belief system or doctrine; and encouraging positive interaction to promote this religio-cultural way of life—Da’wa—.\(^{104}\)

In any society, whether Muslim or non-Muslim, Muslims tend to view their Umma as designed to lead humanity from darkness to light in all possible senses,\(^{105}\) to lead it towards a better humanity and a better world, she quotes the Qur’anic verse “you were the best nation ever raised for mankind”.\(^{106}\) This means that the role of Muslims is not confined to the Umma followers or geographically restricted within Muslim-majority land. The very concept of Umma indicates no restriction to particular human group or geographical location. The modern Islamic

\(^{101}\) Id. at 57.
\(^{102}\) Fishman, supra note 19 , at 4.
\(^{104}\) Id. at 56.
\(^{105}\) Alwâni, supra note 8, at 14.
\(^{106}\) Qur’ân 3:110.
scholars, specifically Fiqh of minorities’ advocates, disagree with some points in classic jurisprudence, and refer to the notion of Dâr al-islâm—in contrast to Dâr al-Kufr or Dâr al-harb, to denote any place where “Muslims can live in peace and security, even if he lives among non-Muslim minority.”¹⁰⁷ They support their view by a set of arguments, most important of which is the emigration to Abyssinia mentioned in chapter one.

The grounds on which Fiqh of minorities’ scholars have tried to articulate the modern reasons and importance of the Islamic presence in non-Muslim societies are based primarily on the previous perception of Umma. Their justification of the importance of Muslims presence and engagement in their new society is organized along three main axes: the Universalist nature of the Islamic message engrained in its creed and Shari‘a; to protect Muslims and to support them morally and practically in these societies.¹⁰⁸ And to promote a civilizational dialogue between Islamic and other civilizations,¹⁰⁹ which is the core idea of Da‘wa. These previous axes reflect the core pillars of the role and the message of the Umma identified by Mustafa. In this sense, Muslim minorities do not just represent a quantitative power that has merely transferred from one place to another; rather their existence in these communities signifies a cultural and a civilizational symbol that goes along with the universalistic nature of the concept of Umma.

Thus, the Umma argument provides a bigger context than the Da‘wa one, where the latter is reflected as one of the pillars of the Islamic Umma, as well as one of its objectives. Such context would turn integration from a means to an end in itself especially that Fiqh of minorities was originally designed to theorize for a permanent presence and the creation of a genuine European Muslim. The coming section tests both March’s and Nadia’s arguments by exploring advocates of Fiqh of minorities’ views on integration and its entailed concepts, namely the relation with non-Muslims, loyalty, and citizenship in lights of both Umma and Da‘wa.

C- Contributors to Fiqh of minorities’ theory and integration

The notion of integration entails other concepts: the relations with non-Muslims, citizenship, and loyalty—national loyalty as opposed to Umma loyalty. In this section we will analyze how different scholars articulated the position of integration within the Fiqh of minorities’ framework, and relating them to the previously introduced Da’wa and Umma perspectives.

---

¹⁰⁹ Id.

1- ‘Alwânî

Tâha Jâbir Al-‘Alwânî is widely recognized as the founder of Fiqh of minorities. He studied ‘Usûl al-Fiqh at Al-Azhar University and migrated to the United States in the 1970s. He ended up as the founder and former chairman of the Fiqh Council of North America. He asserts that the concept of Fiqh of minorities did not come about in vacuum; rather it reflects tens of cases he was exposed to in his interaction with Muslim minorities whether in Europe or the United States.

In a personal interview, ‘Alwânî details how the original reason behind Fiqh of minorities was not how to integrate or incorporate Muslims within the community because they already had the potential for total assimilate due to their lack of religious awareness and the consolidation of the concepts of followership. Rather, the aim was to preserve a proper identity that does not lead to a “schizophrenic personality” when it comes to who they are and what their purpose or role towards their Umma and community are. Culture is an integral factor of shaping a society and, thus, the aim of Fiqh of minorities is to “purify” what Muslims take from their original countries, to avoid negative characteristics engrained in such societies, and carry their positive contribution and potential with them to their new society. The main distinction between Fiqh of minorities and general Fiqh in ‘Alwânî’s view is the aim to establish and theorize for a “permanent” Islamic presence in the west, by creating a paradigm shift from the Fiqh of a temporary license into a Fiqh of permanent context. Such presence would serve as a fundamental component of the Western community because Islamic speech is universal and the civilizational and religious message of the oneness of Allâh has to reach all areas of the world.

In theorizing for such a presence, ‘Alwânî explores, first, for the nature of the relation between Muslims and non-Muslims, and second, the necessity of a proactive engagement with society. He notes that one of the main principles of Fiqh of minorities is to determine the nature of interaction between Muslim minority and other non-Muslim majorities and how it should be like. A number of methods, means and tools assist different branches of Fiqh, including Fiqh of minorities. Among these methods is to go back to the general verses and principles of the main sources of Shari’ā: Qur’ān and Sunna putting into account the higher objectives of Shari’ā as well as the context of the Muslim minority. One of these verses that are considered by ‘Alwānī, as well as most Fiqh of minorities’ founders, as a fundamental rule in Muslims relations with others states that:

110 Fishman, supra note 2, at 3.

God does not forbid you to be kind and equitable to those who have neither fought you on account of your religion nor driven you from your homes. God loves the equitable. But God only forbids you to be allies with those who have fought you because of your religion and driven you from your homes and abetted others to do so. Those that make friends with them are wrongdoers.113

According to scholarly interpretations, “this verse permits associations with those who have not declared war against the Muslims and allows kindness towards them, even though they might not be allies.”114 115 Fiqh of minorities takes the principle of these two verses into consideration when establishing the moral and legal foundations upon which Muslim minorities should deal with other non-Muslim majorities. All developments, situations and verdicts are judged according to this principle.116 Moreover, he cites the Qur’ānic verse “best nation ever raised for mankind,”117 to clarify the leading role Muslims should be taking. This implies that the Muslim nation—Umma—was raised for the benefit of all mankind and “should be sharing this benefit with other human societies.”118 ‘Alwānī refutes the misconception of Dār al-islām and Dār al-harb stating that Dār al-islām is wherever Muslims enjoy peace and security and more importantly the cultural and religious message of Islam should not be hindered by boundaries.119 Although ‘Alwānī does not expose directly to the issue of citizenship, one can withdraw from his previous analysis on Dār al-islām that Fiqh of minorities views any place where Muslims can practice his or her faith as the abode, the home, or the land of Islam.

This previous thought on where Dār al-islām lies is completed by his idea concerning the obligation and the responsibility towards public participation. ‘Alwānī’s vision was articulated in 113 Qur’ān 60:8-9.

114 ‘Alwānī, supra note 8, at 14.
115 Although there have been arguments that this verse has been abrogated, the majority of interpretations argue otherwise that this verse applies to all non-muslims who didn’t antagonize Muslims or show hostility to their religion declare war against them. See, Qurtuby’s Al Jami’ li Ahkam Al Qur’ān, available at: http://www.islamweb.net/newlibrary/display_book.php?flag=1&bk_no=48&surano=60&ayano=8 (Last visited Jan 12, 2011).
116 Id.
117 Qur’ān 3:110
118 ‘Alwānī, supra note 8, at 14.
119 Id. at 15.
his suggestion to redefine the question posed in front of jurists from Muslim minorities individuals. Redefining the question would reflect reality in all its facets and turn the answer from a negative license to a positive responsibility towards the Muslim community as well as the Western community. He views interaction and constructive engagement within the community as based on two principles: standing up for oneself and forbearance. The first states that Muslims should under no circumstances accept an inferior position, thus any negativity or lack of interaction with one’s community are against core Islamic principles. The second entails that even if positive engagement required some compromises in areas that do not contradict the core creed of Islam; integration is still acceptable, given the positive nature and the role of the Muslim Umma.

2- Qaradâwî

Yusuf al-Qaradâwî also studied at Al-Azhar University and in 1997 he founded the European Council for Fatwa and Research [ECFR] for the purpose of providing Muslim minorities in Europe with Islamic legal guidance. It was not until later in the last decade that the ECFR, eventually, adopted Fiqh of minorities as its general policy. Qaradâwî realizes that Muslim minorities are part of the Muslim Umma on one hand and of their current community on the other. He stresses the importance of balancing these two aspects of a Muslim’s belonging and identity and that Fiqh of minorities should consider them while exploring Muslim minorities’ issues. Furthermore, he distinguishes between different connotations—faith, geographic, political and social—of the concept of Umma in his analysis to the definition, all of which has different impact on the idea of citizenship. For Qaradâwî, Umma does not contradict with having multiple loyalties, belongings and identities. On the other side, the concept of citizenship itself is a 120 For instance, check his example of political participation mentioned earlier.

---

122 ‘Alwâni cites Ibn Taymiya in establishing this principle where the latter mentions that “Muslims are required to do their best to cope with the situation. Those who assume office with the intention of pleasing God and serving the objectives of Islam and the interests of the people to the best of their ability, and who try their best to prevent wrong-doing, will not be penalized for what they could not achieve. It is far better that food people are in office than bad ones.”
123 Fishman, supra note 1.
124 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 34.
neutral concept that carries no ideological significance whether religious or secular; it is a flexible notion that is shaped and adapted based on preference and need.\textsuperscript{125}

For Qaradâwî, though the concept of citizenship is new, it was recognized by the prophet in the \textit{Madina} statement—the constitution of the first Islamic state—that recognized residents who belonged to different religions and tribes. The philosophy of the \textit{Madina} statement was based on peaceful coexistence and mutual support among the citizens of this state regardless of their differences.\textsuperscript{126} The only bond among them was their loyalty to their state which responds to the previous definition of citizenship as a “voluntary bond joined within national horizons and ruled by a constitution”.\textsuperscript{127} Qaradâwî builds on the issue of citizenship and integration by establishing for the necessity of Muslim presence in non-Muslim communities. The reasons for such presence are classified into three main categories: the universalistic nature of the message of the Islamic \textit{Umma}; supporting and empowering Muslim minorities in such countries through allowing them to live a proper Islamic life, preserving their identity, and guiding them through interaction and integration; and participating in the development of humankind in general and their community specifically through educating Muslim minorities on their rights and freedoms as well as on their duties.\textsuperscript{128} Moreover, for Qaradâwî, the term “Islamic state” does not mean it includes those who belong to the Islamic faith only, rather it reflects the majority and legal system.\textsuperscript{129} Thus, Qaradâwî refutes the dichotomy of Dâr al-islâm and Dâr al-harb and prefers the notion “out of Dâr al-islâm.”\textsuperscript{130}

Qaradâwî posits that it is currently impossible to undo the Islamic presence in the West as Muslims have been involved in all aspects of life, political, economic and social. However, when it comes to their identity, he stresses that the concept of integration entails the values of diversity and exchange that lead to enriching the society.\textsuperscript{131} The idea of citizenship allows for a Muslim a peaceful coexistence with the Western community. It also entails having the same rights and duties of other individuals in the community—which adds to the ideas of empowering \textsuperscript{125} \textit{id.} at 47.

\textsuperscript{126} \textit{QARADÂWÎ, supra} note 7, at 25.
\textsuperscript{127} \textit{March, supra} note 94, at 81.
\textsuperscript{128} \textit{QARADÂWÎ, supra} note 48, at 35-37.
\textsuperscript{129} \textit{QARADÂWÎ, supra} note 7, at 32.
\textsuperscript{130} \textit{QARADÂWÎ, supra} note 48, at 35.
\textsuperscript{131} \textit{QARADÂWÎ, supra} note 7, at 83.
Muslim minorities as well as making positive contribution. The first generation Muslim immigrants, Qaradâwî argues, show more attachment to their countries of origin. Thus, the ECFR has always urged Muslim minorities for integration. In fact it has called it an obligation for Muslim minorities to positively integrate and interact with their community. Furthermore, they have to strive for the service and the development of their communities while preserving their faith, values and moral system that are core to their Islamic belief system. Only through preserving the proper identity, can Muslim minorities integrate and contribute positively in the Western communities. Qaradâwî calls this vision the tough equation: commitment without isolation, integration without assimilation.

3- Najjâr

Abd al-Majíd al-Najjâr is a Tunisian scholar and another graduate of Al-Azhar University, who is also a member of the ECFR. In the introduction to his book “Fiqh of citizenship”, he denotes that the role of contemporary verdict is to preserve the Islamic identity of the Muslim presence in the West on one side, and to turn this presence into a role model to all people which will also, hopefully, lead to resolving European local issues and participate in the development of these communities on the other. The latter vision turns Muslim minorities into contributors and not mere consumers. Like ‘Alwânî and Qaradâwî, Najjâr emphasizes the permanent nature of Muslim minorities that Fiqh of minorities strives to preserve. Moreover, he identifies the role of Fiqh of minorities as a legal framework that responds to issues in front of Muslim minorities as “citizens” and members of a Western community and not just as Muslims. While initially, Muslim immigrants had short-term objectives that centered mainly on economic, social and political realms, with time they have evolved into the long-term objective of settlement or Tawtîn. Fiqh of minorities, in Najjâr’s view, is an adequate tool to respond to the permanent presence of Muslim minorities and answers philosophical questions such as their role in the West in light of their settlement project.

He introduces the concept of civilizational partnership between Muslims and non-Muslims where both cooperate to contribute to and promote their own society. The logic of this concept

---

132 Id. at 79-84.
133 Najjâr, supra note 17, at 5.
134 Id. at 24.
entails that, given the current quantitative and qualitative existence of Muslims as a minority—especially those who have become full citizens, in non-Muslim countries, that requires a fundamental change in their role in the community. The basic argument here is that while the Muslim existence in non-Muslim communities—especially the West—can be of benefit specifically in the areas of science and administration for instance, such presence, at the same time can contribute to the promotion of the community culture in areas such as family cohesion and violence. That is to say, this argument opposes the theory of the clash of civilization and creates a culture of dialogue and common contribution. Such “cultural partnership” plays, arguably, a pivotal role in the positive integration of Muslim minorities. Cultural partnership becomes an objective for Muslim minorities it will lead eventually to integration whereby Muslims have to be interactive actors in the community in order to add value.

The core of the civilizational partnership reflects the essence of the modern concept of social contract which requires agreeing on working in the community’s best interest. Such a social contract is the practical interpretation of both: loyalty and citizenship. Najjār finds for the latter an Islamic justification that centers on two main reasons: first, fulfilling their role as good citizens which is also part of the Islamic belief, regardless of the secular notion of the social contract; and second, and more importantly in his view, to serve as a role model which fulfills Muslims’ original purpose in life which is the duty of Da’wa. His definition of Da’wa bypasses the direct preaching that aims at converting non-Muslims to Islam. Rather he calls it Da’wa Li-mâ Fih Maslaha or the call and working for what leads to benefit or public interest. Thus, Najjār views the role of Fiqh of minorities as facilitating living an Islamic life in a non-Islamic-rule context, and to interacting with their community positively guided by their Islamic identity. Such interaction would lead eventually to the development of this community especially through 135 See generally, id.

137 See, QARADÂWI, supra note 48 at 188-191 [he mentioned proposed solutions suggested by Abdul Sattar Abu Ghodda for the mortgage issue in the Muslim countries. Many of these solutions could be adapted to the economic system to overcome the side effects of the interest-based systems.
138 NJÂJÂR, supra note 17, at 42.
139 Id. at 25.
140 Id. at 6.
offering ethical, cultural and spiritual Islamic values, which is an essential dimension of the concept of Da‘wa which he proposes.¹⁴¹

The concept of civilizational partnership, introduced by Najjâr, in addition to emphasizing on the idea of social contract, bases foundations for both: citizenship and integration. At first he provides evidence for the nature of the relationship that should take place between Muslims and non-Muslims by citing two Qur’ânic verses:

> O mankind! We have created you from a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that you may know one another. . . ¹⁴²
>
> Thus We have made you [true Muslims - real believers of Islamic Monotheism, true followers of Prophet Muhammad and his Sunnah—legal ways—], a Wasat—just—and the best—nation, that you be witnesses over mankind and the Messenger—Muhammad—be a witness over you. ¹⁴³

The first verse responds to the nature of the relationship between Muslims and non-Muslims which is based on knowing one another and interacting. The speech in this verse is directed to all humankind, and not just Muslims. The second verse mentions Shahâda. To Najjâr, Shahâda is the core of Da‘wa, where Muslims have to deliver their message of good and benefit—whether moral or physical, to all humankind. This also entails cooperation with all people, whether Muslims or non-Muslims, on what is common interest and good, and to unite and fight, whether with Muslims or non-Muslims, against evil.¹⁴⁴ The latter is the essence of definition of positive integration: cooperation and interaction to fulfill the mutual interest of the community.¹⁴⁵

4- Bin Bayya

Abdulla Bin Bayya is a Mauritanian scholar currently teaching at King Faysal University in Saudi Arabia. He has not theorizes as much as the previous scholars concerning the reasons behind Muslims presence in non-Muslim countries. Rather he deals with it as the status-quo where “Muslim minorities face strong challenges on an individual level as they try to lead an Islamic life among an environment that adopts a materialistic philosophy,”¹⁴⁶ thus a special Fiqh is needed to respond to their special circumstances. He identifies four main objectives. The first is called

---
¹⁴¹ Id. at 54.
¹⁴³ Qur’ân 2:143.
¹⁴⁴ NAJJÂR, supra note 17, at 27.
¹⁴⁵ Id. at 80.
the general objective and protecting the religious life of Muslim minorities; the second is the propagation of the message of Islam, “leading to a gradual establishment of Islam in the communities where they live”; the third is establishing rules of coexistence with non-Muslims; the last is moving from an individual to collective stage in Fiqh rules when dealing with issues of Muslim minorities. Unlike the previous scholars, Bin Bayya shares a narrow view of the concept of Da’wa. He confines only converting other non-Muslims. However, similar to the previous scholars, Bin Bayya is concerned with both preserving the identity and establishing bases for a healthy Muslim interaction with the community.

5- Ramadan

Tariq Ramadan is a Swiss Islamic intellectual and preacher. Though his family is originally from Egypt, he was born in Switzerland where he lived his entire life. Currently, he is Professor of Contemporary Islamic Studies at Oxford University. Unlike the others, he is not a Fiqh scholar. That is why he does not delve into the theory of Fiqh of minorities. Rather his arguments center on Muslim identity in the West and how Islamic Fiqh can serve it.

In his book: Western Muslims and the Future of Europe, Ramadan talks about “Western Muslims” and not “Muslim minorities in the west”. He promotes a new Muslim identity arguing that contemporary Muslims are succeeding in finding harmony between their faith and their Western context. His goal is to create an independent Western Islam anchored not in the traditions of Islamic countries, but in the reality of the West. This is where his connection with Fiqh of minorities begins as he supports a “fresh reading of Islamic sources, interpreting them for a Western context and demonstrating how a new understanding of universal Islamic principles can open the door to integration into Western societies.” He, however, challenges the term “Fiqh of minorities” and believes it should be rethought because, in his view, Muslims should not think of themselves as a minority, but rather as citizens and partners in their own society.

147 Id.
150 Id.
151 Id. at 82.
He challenges three main misconceptions or “staging posts” with regards to the Muslim presence in the west: the dualist approach, minority mindset and thinking, and the integration in the sense of adaptation. The dualist approach refers to the idea that Muslims continue to perceive themselves as “the other” which will naturally end with Fiqh al-Rukhas–Fiqh of licenses—that consolidates the temporary nature of the Muslim presence in such communities.¹⁵² He even criticizes Qaradâwî’s conception of dealing with Western societies as “other societies” because the normal place for Muslims is the Muslim-majority societies. He believes that Sharî’a teaches Muslims to integrate anything that is not contradict its core. This, for him, includes all dimensions of life—legal, social, and cultural, which Muslims should consider their own.¹⁵³

He redefines the role of the Umma to reflect the “universal message of Islam directed to human intelligence toward the quest for justice.”¹⁵⁴ Western Muslims, thus, can benefit from the new framework of Fiqh of minorities—regardless of his disagreement with some of its premises. Muslims share the duty of studying their society and to working for justice and against any form of injustice with their fellow citizens.¹⁵⁵

Ramadan links the idea of loyalty and Umma in a unique way. The value of monotheism in Islam gives rise to a specific way of life and interprets every action in a common way. This perception is the heart of Muslims’ sense of belonging to the Umma.¹⁵⁶ Muslims ultimate loyalty belongs to God, not countries or ideologies; therefore, they should be models of honesty, justice and loyalty.¹⁵⁷ Given that contracts—in this case Ramadan refers specifically to social contracts—determine one’s status, rights and duties and guides his or her interaction, Muslims do not have the right to break such a contract unilaterally. Thus, loyalty has no exceptions, because to be a Muslim means to be entrusted with a pledge—Amâna.¹⁵⁸ Thus, if a clear conflict of terms of reference between Sharî’a and Western secular law occurs, “a specific study should be carried out by Muslim jurists to determine, by formulating a legal opinion—Verdict—. . . that might

---

¹⁵² Id. at 68.
¹⁵³ Id. at 68-69.
¹⁵⁴ Id. at 176.
¹⁵⁵ Id. at 177-178.
¹⁵⁶ Id. at 101.
¹⁵⁷ Id. at 107.
¹⁵⁸ Id. at 107-108.
provide the Muslim with a satisfying solution, both as a practicing believer and as a resident and/or citizen.”

Thus, Ramadan sees no contradiction between being a Muslim and having loyalty to Umma on the one side and being a European and having loyalty to your country on the other since loyalty should not be to an Islamic culture that is affiliated to an Islamic nation. That is why he encourages building an independent Islamic European culture and identity. However, not to undermine the influence and the importance of the Islamic Umma, Tariq Ramadan posits that one of the advantages of such integration is empowering Muslim minorities all over the world.

D- Concluding remarks: Umma, integration, and Fiqh of minorities

After reviewing different contributions on how Fiqh of minorities respond to the issues of citizenship and integration, we note the following:

First, the need for a special case for the existence of Muslims as a minority has to be framed in a wider collective and more cultural way. It cannot be limited only to religious rituals; rather, it supersede this one dimension of the Islamic belief system to embrace all sorts of social, political and economic interactions, whether among Muslims themselves or between Muslims and non-Muslims in the same community. Nadia Mustafa argues that the issues facing Muslim minorities, especially in the West, can be traced back to the following three dimensions: the relationship between Islam and secularism, the relation between Sharî’a and national legislations, and the issue of dual loyalty—religion, civilization and/or culture versus national and civil allegiance. She contends, that socio-political issues remain the most important compared to other religio-cultural factors. She summarizes the main issue in the question of the position of religion between citizenship and identity, culminating in the role of Fiqh of minorities.

Second, the objectives common among all mentioned scholars of Fiqh of minorities are: to protect the Muslim identity and religious practices; to recognize and become involved in the Western legal and social system as full citizens with rights and duties; and to serve as a role model that fulfills the core of the Islamic message of the Umma. Thus, the real question Fiqh of minorities advocates are concerned with is not whether Muslim minorities should integrate or not. Rather, it is how they should integrate and what the necessary conditions required for a positive integration that is beneficial for both the Muslim and his or her community are. In other words, this Fiqh, while attempting to accomplish the mission of integration and preserving the Muslim identity, treats the Muslim not only as a Muslim with religious ritualistic obligations, but also as a member in a society and, more importantly, as a law abiding citizen in a modern society with rights and obligations.

Third, in its principles and methodology, Fiqh of minorities is designed to respond to the issue of Muslim minorities’ integration in a non-Muslim community, which is why it requires the scholar to master the knowledge of the actual circumstances and factors facing Muslim minorities. However, one is to question the relation between the success of such Fiqh, in practice, and the numbers of Muslims welcoming the concept of this Fiqh.

The final chapter applies the previous theory and aspirations of Fiqh of minorities’ advocates regarding the role such Fiqh can play in the process of integration to two case studies: interest-based Mortgage and Islâm al-zawja.

V- Chapter Four: Fiqh of Minorities in Application

This chapter applies the theories and aspirations of different Fiqh of minorities’ scholars articulated in chapters two and three to reality and measure their validity. The focus will be on two case studies: Islâm al-zawja and interest-based mortgage.

A- Islâm al-zawja

The widespread modern rule regarding the conversion of the wife to Islam while her husband is still a non-Muslim—the case known in Fiqh as Islâm al-zawja—is clear. The modern legal opinion on interfaith marriage states that “Interfaith marriages are prohibited, except in the case of a Muslim male marrying a scriptural female—Kitâbiyyah.”163 Despite different articulations and criticisms of this rule, our concern here is not the validity or the basis of this rule; rather, it is how Fiqh of minorities–given its principles and objectives, deals with the issue of Islâm al-zawja and whether it has a significant impact on integration.\(^{164}\)

While most Islamic schools agree that a Muslim wife cannot remain married to a non-Muslim husband, Fiqh of minorities scholars like Qaradâwî addresses the issue in a broader manner while introducing this Fiqh. Though similar efforts, like the ECFR verdict, have tried to suggest alternatives, most of them have treated the issue as an exception, or an attempt to get a license. This is a fundamental difference with Fiqh of minorities that bypasses the mere individual verdict for a standard framework comprising clear principles and objectives. In other words, Fiqh of minorities is not just concerned with what the final verdict is but rather how and why this verdict was reached, which is, arguably, determined largely by this Fiqh’s philosophy of the importance of integration.

The ECFR periodical–al-Majalla al-Ilmiyya–announced in one of its issues, dedicated particularly to the case of Islâm al-zawja, that due to the different opinions on this matter, it could not reach one definite verdict. Instead, it stated the majority opinion while mentioning the opposing ones as well. The final verdict was that the wife is not allowed to stay with her husband after the three months of Iddah–her waiting period after divorce–and even if they do not divorce they must be separated. Thus, there are no marital rights and obligations on the wife’s side. The verdict concludes by noting some scholarly opinions which allow full marriage with full rights and obligations including sexual relationship under the condition that it does not harm or affect her faith and that she strives for his conversion no matter how long it takes. That is, not to push females away from converting.

In the same issue of Al Majalla al Ilmiyya, the first article by Joudai, explores whether the objectives of the Islamic faith–given the context and the reasons, are accomplished by separating a wife from her family and husband and reaches a similar conclusion as Qaradâwî’s seen later: the act of conversion gives the woman the option and not the obligation to ask for separation.\(^{165}\) The second article by Zoubair proposes that though the standard rule is separation there are conditions–like the wife’s insistence on staying with her husband,

\(^{164}\) Id. at 10.

\(^{165}\) See generally, Abdulla Ibn al-Joudai, Islam Al Mar’aa Wa Baqaa’ Zawjaha Ala Deeneh [The conversion of the woman withouther husband], AL MAJALLA AL ILMIIYA LIL MAALIS AL ORUBBI LIL IFTA [the scientific Magazine of ECFR], Jan. 2003, at 13-197.
preserving her faith and so forth. Under such conditions if fulfilled, the marriage is permitted to be sustained. The third article by Faisal reaches the conclusion of separation as well; the only case where temporary marital rights and obligations are sustained is during the period between the termination of the marriage contract and the actual divorce. Given that the process may take a significant period of time, sexual and marital needs, thus, lie under the category of Darûra. The fourth article by Fares, on the contrary, criticizes any argument that promotes sustaining the marriage. In his opinion, the case here is the annulment of both physical separation as well as contractual divorce. The fifth article by Kouddous states that though there is a consensus on the principle of separation, there is a lack of consensus when it comes to when exactly separation takes place, and what the form of such separation is—just physical or contractual as well. He concludes that it is a termination of the contract after the three months of Iddah and that the wife should seek termination even through court.

With the exception of Faisal who to some extent considers reality and the resulting Darûra of the physical needs, the rest of the opinions here are separated from the demands of reality and are very much immersed in jurisprudential discourse. Even when Joudai refers to objectives of Shari’a, he does not identify clearly those objectives and their relation to the reality of Muslim minorities. Their opinions are mostly quoting and seeking evidence in classical jurisprudential opinions with no original Ijtihād whatsoever. By examining how Fiqh of minorities’ scholars perceive the case of Islâm al-zawja, this section identifies how the latter Fiqh proposes real Ijtihād that, more importantly, truly considers Muslim minorities’ situation.

Qaradâwî—as one of the advocates of Fiqh of minorities—points out that many women might be willing to convert but the separation rule hinders them. He starts his argument by mentioning

---

166 Abdulla Zoubair Saleh, Hokm Baqaa’ Man Aslamat Ma’a Zawjaha Alathi Lam yoslem [The verdict on the woman who converts while her husband does not], AL MAJALLA AL ILMIYYA LIL MAILIS AL ORUBBI LIL ITFA’ [The Scientific Magazine of ECFR], Jan. 2003, at 207-242.
167 Faysal Mawlawy, Islam Al Mar’aa Wa Baqaa’ Zawjaha Ala Deeneh [the conversion of the woman withouther husband], AL MAJALLA AL ILMIYYA LIL MAILIS AL ORUBBI LIL ITFA’ [The scientific Magazine of ECFR], Jan. 2003, at 243-308.
168 Mohamed Abdul Qadir Abu Faris, Athar Islam Ahad Al tarafayn Fil Nikah, [The impact of the conversion of one spouse on the marriage], AL MAJALLA AL ILMIYYA LIL MAILIS AL ORUBBI LIL ITFA’ [The scientific Magazine of ECFR], Jan. 2003, at 309-401.
169 Nehat Abdul koudous, Islam Al Mar’aa Wa Baqaa’ Zawjaha Ala Deeneh [The conversion of the woman withouther husband], AL MAJALLA AL ILMIYYA LIL MAILIS AL ORUBBI LIL ITFA’ [the scientific Magazine of ECFR], Jan. 2003, at 409-420.
nine opinions found in the traditional Fiqh, articulated namely by Ibn al-Qayyim,\(^{170}\) regarding the matter of Islam al Zawja.\(^{171}\) The first five opinions call for the immediate or the eventual separation between spouses. While the second group of opinions, which will be discussed, favor the maintenance of the marriage contract. The sixth opinion confirms that the woman has the choice of waiting and hoping for her husband’s conversion even if it takes years–based on the narrative of Umar who gave a converting woman the choice of staying with or leaving her still-Christian husband.\(^{172}\) This was the opinion favored and adopted by Ibn al-Qayyim. The seventh opinion, establishes the principle that husband, even if non-Muslim, is more worthy of his wife, condition that she does not leave her home country and performed Hijra–based on Ali’s narrative. The eighth opinion proclaims that the marriage contract is maintained as long as they were not separated by the Imâm or the judge. The final opinion provides that she continues to be his wife with all rights and duties except for the sexual relationship.

Qaradâwî criticizes Ibn al-Qayyim for not considering the whole nine opinions while focusing on and adopting the sixth opinion where a woman can stay with her husband, wait and strive for his conversion but with no sexual relationship.\(^{173}\) Qaradâwî denotes a significant practical problem with such an opinion: the physical needs. That is why he turns to reconsidering and reinterpreting the Qur’ānic text while consolidating it with the seventh opinion of Ali. In his analysis, the verse is directed to Muslim women who have converted, left their husbands and performed Hijra. The order here is for Muslims not to return them—the newly Muslim women—to their non-Muslim husbands in this particular case. He adds another condition; by examining the context of this verse it was meant in the period when the husbands were from a group of people explicitly at war with Muslims.\(^{174}\) Recalling the need of new converts to stay with their husbands and families in non-Muslim environments, especially if they are hoping for their conversion, Qaradâwî infers that it is possible that ‘Ali based his opinion on such a rationale and perspective to the verse. He also responds to the opinions that call for strict immediate separation by stating that the evidence from Qur’ān and Sunna were taken out of context and misinterpreted. Such opinions, in his view, are against the narratives as they were not adopted

---

\(^{171}\) QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 108-120.

\(^{172}\) Id. at 118.

\(^{173}\) Id. at 119-120.

\(^{174}\) Qaradâwî, supra note 48, at 124.
by the Prophet’s companions.¹⁷⁵ Thus, noting how Qaradâwî developed his argument and based on his classification, this case reflects as both selective and creative İjtihâd.

Qaradâwî concludes by highlighting three considerable opinions on which scholars and Muftîs can rely on to respond to the issue of İslâm al-zawja in a non-Muslim community in order to overcome the resulting social dilemmas. The first is that of ‘Alî who stated that the husband enjoys protection and, thus, the advantage of keeping her since she is originally his wife under the condition that she does not leave her town or place of residence—and does not migrate whether to Dâr al-İslâm or other. The second opinion is Umar’s where he asserts that when women convert the judge either terminates directly or not, giving the women the opportunity to choose between staying with her husband or terminating the marriage. The final opinion is al-Zahry’s whereby the marriage continues as long as there is no verdict or judgment that separates them. Unlike the known case where a Muslim man is only allowed to marry a scriptural woman, in the case of İslâm al-zawja, scholars consider the marriage of a Muslim–converting–woman from a non-Muslim man in general, whether scriptural or not. This evidence is found in different narratives used by scholars like that of Umar, ‘Alî and Zainab the daughter of Muhammad himself who was married to a “non-scriptural” non-Muslim.¹⁷⁶ However, this is not to be confused with marriage to a communist or an apostate—even if legally a Muslim. While Qaradâwî’s verdict is clear on the prohibition of marrying the latter in the first place, one might wonder whether İslâm al-zawja verdict includes maintaining the marriage contract with a communist or an apostate husband, who, according to Qaradâwî’s verdict should be penalized.¹⁷⁷

Qaradâwî concludes his argument with several points. First, there is no definite text, nor is there a consensus that addresses this issue clearly. Second, the mere act of conversion though allowing annulment does not entail the automatic annulment of the marriage. Finally, Qaradâwî bypasses Ibn al-Qayyim’s favored opinion, which although does not call for separation, bars the physical marital relationship. His interpretation of the Qur’ănic text concludes that the marriage contract and its entailed marital rights can be maintained. This includes the sexual relationship since it is a necessity for good companionship between spouses—a fundamental value in Islamic ¹⁷⁵ Id. at 118-124.

¹⁷⁶ Id.
¹⁷⁷ Refer to his verdict on the marriage of a Muslim woman from a communist, Qaradâwî, supra note 48, at 89.
philosophy, given that she can preserve her faith and practice. The act of conversion, thus, merely turns the contract from binding to optional.

Qaradâwî contends that such case can be generalized on Muslims all over the world; however, he stresses that Muslim minorities deserve it more given their circumstances. On the contrary, Ahmad al-Rawi, chairman of the Union of Islamic Organizations in Europe, strictly limits this verdict to the European context where “the woman is respected and this is crucial.”

‘Alwânî provides an interesting point of view on the objectives of Shari’a. He notes that one of the fundamental purposes of Islam is I’mâr or construction. If we prevent a woman from staying with her husband after her conversion, Islam would contradict the concept of construction and nurturing in Islam. Rather, in such cases, Islam would be the direct reason for a family collapse. Moreover, by valuing the importance of the family by a wife staying with her husband, Fiqh of minorities does not only value the principles of Taysîr and responds to reality when it comes to Muslim minorities and the ideal nature of relationship with non-Muslims, it also considers the social interest represented in preserving the family unit, which signifies an important Islamic value. This idea relates directly to Najjâr’s concept of cultural partnership and how Muslims should positively contribute to their community.

The next case requires more creativity when it comes to Ijtihâd due to the lack of both: sufficient evidence from inherited tradition and explicit rules in the text.

B- interest-based mortgage

The general rule is that Ribâ or usury is forbidden—Harâm—based on evidence from Qur’ân, Sunna, and the Islamic scholar’s consensus. Ribâ, as defined in the encyclopedia of Islam, literally means “increase” and is technically used by Islamic scholars to reflect “any unjustified increase of capital for which no compensation is given.” Such definition, according to many 178 Personal interview with sheikh Yusuf al-Qaradâwî , Cairo (Jan. 23, 2012) [hereinafter Qaradâwî interview] (refer to the annex).

---

179 Fishman, supra note 2, at 12.
180 Could also mean reclamation, development and nurturing.
181 Qaradâwî interview, supra note 178.
scholars, applies to the interest-based mortgage.\textsuperscript{183} For instance, the Islamic research academy reached the verdict that any interest on any type of loan is considered prohibited Ribâ regardless of the amount or any categorization attempt. Other institutions of higher Islamic status like the Academy of Muslim World League, the Second Conference of Islamic Banks and Organization Islamic Conference support similar legal opinions.\textsuperscript{184}

Some significant attempts, however, such as Abdul Razzâk al-Sanhûrî,\textsuperscript{185} and his contemporary ‘Ali Gom’aa,\textsuperscript{186} have tried to draw some distinctions. For instance, Al-Sanhûrî categorizes Ribâ–usury–into Ribâ Fadl,\textsuperscript{187} Ribâ Nasî’a,\textsuperscript{188} Ribâ Jâhiliyya,\textsuperscript{189} and Ribâ Qardh.\textsuperscript{190} Although he asserts that all four kinds are prohibited in Islam, one is the worst of them all–Ribâ al-Jâhiliyya–when a person does not pay his due after the stipulated time and the seller increases the price. This type resembles the modern concept of “compound interest”\textsuperscript{191} which should be utterly prohibited under any circumstances. Sanhûrî states that other types of Ribâ are prohibited as well but in terms of techniques and practices and not in principles. That is to say that other than Ribâ al-Jâhiliyya, that was explicitly prohibited in Qur’ân, followed by Sunna, the other types of Ribâ were–correctly–developed and clarified by scholars and jurists to overcome any potential misunderstandings. While this makes these types of Ribâ originally Harâm–prohibited, it opens the door for license and exceptions.\textsuperscript{192} In Sanhûrî’s definition, the “need” is justified here by the

\textsuperscript{183} QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 169.
\textsuperscript{185} 1895-1971
\textsuperscript{187} Ribâ al-fadl “literally [a] profit or [a]surplus obtained by exchanging or selling commodities of superior value over other commodities given), i.e. the form of Ribâ in which an excess or increase is paid in a direct exchange of commodities, from hand to hand, without any time extensions. Ziaul Haqqi, The Nature of Ribâ al-Nasî’a and Ribâ al-Fadl, 21 ISLAMIC STUDIES 21, 19-38 (1982).
\textsuperscript{188} Ribâ Nasî’a means that “Ribâ was rather in loans and credits and not in exchanges/sales. Thus it creates profit or increase whether it is borrowed by a producer or a consumer, used by them or not.” Id. at 31.
\textsuperscript{189} Ribâ Jâhiliyya literally means “pre-Islamic usury, according to which if a debt was not repaid at the proper time the amount due was increased.” ETIENNE RENAUD, THE ISLAMIC BANKS, available at: http://www.oikonomia.it/pages/2003/2003_febrario/pdf/studi_1.pdf (Last visited May 12, 2012).
\textsuperscript{190} Unlike Ribâ Jâhiliyya, Ribâ Qardh is imposed from the beginning and not after the proper time. Hassan O. Ahmad, Shariah contracts in Islamic Banking and finance, available at: http://www.slideshare.net/Annie05/shariah-contracts-islamic-banking-presentation (Last visited May 12, 2012).
\textsuperscript{191} The difference between simple interest and compound interest is that compound interest generates interest on interest, whereas simple interest does not. An Introduction to the Mathematics of Money 13-43 (2007), available at: http://www.springerlink.com.library.aucegypt.edu:2048/content/3k=doi%3a%2210.1007%2F978-0-387-68111-5_2%22 (Last visited May 12, 2012).
\textsuperscript{192} He doesn’t use the term Darûra.
givens of the current capitalist global economic system as well as the “collective” and not “individual” interests. Sanhûrî interestingly notes that the validity of applying any of these types of Ribâ is associated with the specific circumstances and the economic system. Thus, for instance, socialism eventually prevailed as the global economic doctrine, the nature of the previous “need” should be reevaluated and the formerly allowed Ribâ might be prohibited again. 193

How different scholars measure and reinterpret the rules of Ribâ in the case of interest-based mortgage in non-Muslim societies and economic systems from the lens of Fiqh of minorities. The following covers different contributions by scholars from different backgrounds regarding this issue.

1- Al-Haidary

A verdict regarding borrowing money with interest for the purpose of education in a non-Muslim country was answered by Hamad Bin Ibrahim Al-Haidary194 as follows:195

Question: I am a male who lives in Sweden. My question is: whether a Muslim is allowed to borrow money for the purpose of education, noting that the educational system here in Sweden especially university, required that the borrower should return money plus interest after graduation and finding a job?

Answer: A Muslim is not allowed to borrow interest money neither for education nor for any other purpose, whether the load is provided by the government or other entity, because this counts as Usury–Ribâ, as one takes the loan in cash and returns the money more than the originally received debt. The previous case is the typical Ribâ that is determined unjust by Allâh. Be aware my brother that you are in a Land of Test–Dar Ibtila’, your need for education through such mean is a test for your faith. So if you choose to favor what your heart desires over Allâh’s satisfaction then you are following the road of seduction, which might degrade you in Judgment day. And if you favored Allâh’s satisfaction, He will compensate you sooner or later. “And for those who fear Allâh, He–ever–prepares a way out”,196 so fear God and he will reward you.197

This is a case where a Muslim living in a non-Muslim country faces an interest-based economic system. Thus, in order for him to be involved in any economic activities whatsoever, he has to deal with this system. The verdict, however, came from traditional Islamic jurisprudence that 194 Faculty member of Imâm Mohamed Bin Saud Islamic University.

196 Qur’ân 65:2
197 See also, Qaradâwî, supra note 48, at 165.
depended mainly on the scholar’s consensus on, first, a certain rigid definition of what Ribā or usury, and second, on the prohibition of usury in its different forms including interest. Whether the mortgage is for buying a house, a car or for education the rules and the standards are constant. The following explores how advocates of Fiqh of minorities, on the other hand, perceive and answer questions regarding interest-based mortgage in a non-Muslim system.

2- ECFR and SSANA

The European council for fatwa and research–ECFR–as well as the Shari’a Scholars Association of North America [hereinafter SSANA] have issued a verdict on this regard. Both concluded that usury and its different forms like mortgage are prohibited in Islam and that both councils encourage Muslims in a non-Muslim society to promote Hâlal alternatives such as Islamic banking. However, if such alternatives are not currently available, “in case of need and lack of availability of other contracts that are Shari’a acceptable, people living in non-Muslim societies may buy their residence house on mortgage, but not commercial properties and not without needs.”¹⁹⁸ The basis of this verdict go back to the rule of Darûra, that necessity allows the prohibited, which in turn is subject to many conditions in order to be applicable.¹⁹⁹ The verdict rationalizes that otherwise it would create a huge obstacle for Muslims living in a non-Muslim country given that shelter is a necessity for a decent life. Second, the opinion of Abû Hanîfa which states that Muslims are not responsible for changing economic and political rules in non-Muslim countries, and their subsequent economic vulnerability which contradicts with the objectives of Shari’a.²⁰⁰

3- ‘Alwânî

He begins by noting how much Western economic circumstances are fundamentally different from Muslim countries’ economic systems. Thus such a different system should be subjected to a different set of jurisprudential rules. The industrial revolution had a significant impact on the society, thus, the jurist must be aware of the culture of mass-production that prevails in the advanced Western systems. ‘Alwânî argues that the philosophy of usury is not found in the ¹⁹⁹ For more information on Da’wabit (regulations) of Darûra, See Al-MIMMI, supra not 10, at 476-477.

²⁰⁰ QARADÁWÌ, supra note 48, at 177.
Western mentality. Interest is associated with the concept of inflation. It is unjust to borrow a certain amount of money and return it after a certain period of time with a lower normative value. Thus, the main purpose of the interest, which is correlated to the economic cycle, is to maintain the value of the money qualitatively and not just quantitatively. So for him the unlawful Ribâ in Islam is not interest by its Western definition.⁵⁰¹

For ‘Alwânî, the role of Fiqh of minorities here is not to extract Fiqh rules and principles like Darûra or Maslaha to justify an originally unlawful activity. Rather, Fiqh of minorities exercises one of its fundamental characteristics by studying reality thoroughly and relating Shari‘a to context. In such case, the rule of illegitimacy of Ribâ is non-applicable in the first place as the economic system is dealing with a totally different economic activity with different conditions and implications.

⁴- Ramadan

It is important to note, before we resume, that unlike the previous scholars, Ramadan is not a jurist, he is not a jurisprudential scholar, and thus, he does not discuss legal theory of Ribâ as much as providing real life alternatives. Hence, unlike ‘Alwânî, Ramadan views interest as one form of Ribâ and is, thus, utterly unlawful–Harâm. Any economic exchange that does not reflect equality and simultaneity is considered Riba.⁵⁰² In other words, any activity that increases the value of the good without performing any service is a form of Riba.⁵⁰³ He contends that the prohibition of Ribâ in the Islamic economic model has a moral dimension that values justice and solidarity. This same model urges, rather obliges, Muslims to search for other models that respect and comply with the reasons of such prohibition. “We must think of a global alternative, and local projects must be implemented with the idea of leaving the system to the extent possible and not affirming it through blindness, incompetence, or laziness.”⁵⁰⁴

Ramadan views the previous verdict of ECFR and SSANA as a short-term solution that reflects a temporary situation. Darûra and dealing with non-Muslim countries as Dâr al-Kufr, do not serve ⁵⁰¹ ‘Alwânî interview, supra note 46.

⁵⁰² RAMADAN, supra note 140, at 200.
⁵⁰³ Id. at 201.
⁵⁰⁴ Id. at 203.
the purposes of citizenship and permanent presence of Muslim minorities. He emphasizes his point by elaborating on the importance of developing foundational solutions.

What Muslims in the West are in painful need of today is a global approach that would make it possible for them not only to live but also to develop a spirit of economic initiative and creativity capable of putting forward concrete alternatives. . . Constant ad hoc solutions and adaptations are methods that, as we have said, affirm the dominant system of speculation and interest more than they resist it. Our ethics require us to commit ourselves to an in depth and radical resistance. 205

His solution revolves around Western Muslims creating their own economic structure in the Western landscape and thus moving towards economic and financial autonomy. Thus, Fiqh ’s role in solving similar issues has to be “dynamic, ongoing, refined and constantly elaborative over the years.” 206 This process of, specifically, legal integration will eventually lead to a comprehensive Fiqh for the West and not for minorities, that will not only supersedes influences of majority Islamic thought, but the Western legal and legislative systems as well. 207

C- Towards a Fatwa: Main Elements of Fiqh of Minorities’ Methodology

From the previous discussions, different scholars view the issues of interest-based mortgage and Islâm al-zawja from a variety of perspectives. They provide different, and sometimes conflicting, solutions and legal opinions. At the same time, in the case of Islâm al-zawja, much hesitation on the part of scholars, especially those affiliated with the ECFR have been noticed. Such hesitation leads to a lack of consensus. There are two levels of disagreement that lead to such fragmentation. The first level has to do with the permissibility of the action in the first place—keeping the marriage contract or not, allowing interest-based mortgage or not. The second level relates to the reasons constituting the justification for the permissibility of such activity—whether Darûra, Maslaha, civilizational partnership or different system with different rules. However, in spite of all these differences such discrepancies, one can identify five main elements in the Fiqh of minorities’ methodology that help respond to this particular question, regardless of the fact that Scholars might disagree on the way they combine or prioritize these elements.

205 Id. at 206.
206 Id. at 114.
207 Id.
In the case at hand, the first element starts by thoroughly studying the context of the matter in question and its prevailing dimension. So in terms of interest-based mortgage, Fiqh of minorities considers the advantages and the disadvantages of owning a house in a non-Muslim system. For instance, it counts economic advantage like the benefits of investment, which is not an option if they rent instead. There are also the non-economic advantages like the quality and the environment of the place, as well as the independence, the future security and the settlement that are not provided by the rent. It is present in the ECFR and SSANA Verdict, but it is more obvious, particularly in ‘Alwâni’s opinion. The same thing takes place with adopting the I’mâr perspective and the resulting deconstruction of the family.

Recalling ‘Alwâni’s concept of redefining the question—in the Istiftâ process—the second element is to formulate an accurate question in a proper manner that expresses the reality of the Muslim community there, and more importantly, that reflects the higher objectives of Islamic Shari’a. So in the case of Islâm al-zawja the question is whether a married woman converted before or without her husband, whether they both love and respect each other and they might have children. Separation in this case would be not just an obstacle to her conversion but rather a reason for the deconstruction of a family which is against the purposes of Islam.

Similarly, in the second case at hand the main sub-questions to the general question of mortgage in a non-Muslim community are: first, whether this case fulfills the conditions of unlawful Riba; whether the contract between the individual and the bank is a pure interest-based contract or whether it lies under the heading of a deferred sales contract where by the property—or any other article—is replaced with money between the contractors—since the rules of Ribâ apply only on virtual money where you buy money and return it back for more of its original value? Second, whether this interest-based mortgage fulfills the Islamic objective of protecting Muslims money and property? Third, whether owning a property through this mean is a requirement for fulfilling the fundamental Islamic rule of Maslaha or general interest of Muslims? Are there other reasonable and realistic economic alternatives for the process of buying such property?

---

208 Qaradâwî, supra note 48, at 159-160.
209 Id. at 160-161.
This very last question brings us to the third element regarding the existence of other Shari‘a-compliant alternatives like Islamic Murâbaha. Such an alternative is not always available in non-Muslim countries; moreover, it does not resolve the issue of property ownership as initially one has to pay down payments of around 30% of the value of the property. Also Islamic banking does not have long-term financing for more than five years unlike the normal banks which might finance for up to 30 years. Such a dilemma represents the flip coin of a fundamental objective of Fiqh of minorities which is the previously discussed Darûra. It is, however, viewed differently by Ramadan who looks at searching for alternatives as an obligation. He agrees with 'Alwânî that the long-term dependence on concepts like Darûra challenges the core of the permanent presence of the Muslim in the West.

The fourth element, after other alternative cease to be available, is to search within the classic opinions of Fiqh itself for a foundation that allows and explains such activity, even if not aligned with scholarly consensus. For instance, Sheikh Mustafa al-Zarka was one of the first scholars who allowed interest-based mortgages in non-Muslim economic systems, given the appropriate conditions. He based his verdict on the logic of the Hanafî madhhab, which although not in accordance with the general scholarly consensus, is worth considering and responds better to the given needs and circumstances. He, however, stressed that such verdict is not applicable in Dâr al-islâm.

The opinion of Abû Hanîfa, founder of Hanafî madhhab, one of the four madhhab–legal schools–of Sunni Islam, that if a Muslim is allowed peacefully in Dâr al-harb, then it is permissible for him to interact using their own economic system, even if forbidden generally in Dâr al-islâm like usury. Although Abû Hanîfa allowed the taking of usury from non-Muslims and not the other way around, based on the principle of Maslaha–to safeguard the Islamic higher objective of preserving the money of Muslims, this view has been revised by the modern scholars of Fiqh of minorities, which brings us to the fifth element of the Fiqh of minorities’ methodology. Such 210 A Contract, whereby the seller declares the profit he made on the good sold. In Islamic finance the term is used for sales contracts, whereby the bank is selling against deferred payment (Bai‘ Muajjal) and declared profit rate.

---

211 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 158-159.
212 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 46.
213 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 165.
214 Id.
element prevails better in the case of Islâm al-zawja. Qaradâwî, as elaborated, identified nine different opinions regarding the matter and eventually chose the one that responds best to the posed question, even if not the most popular choice among them.

In the fifth and final element, the jurist reorganizes the facts and implications of the issue to identify its objectives and how it relates to the Muslim minorities context. This takes place when there are no previous jurisprudential opinions—a brand new incident—or to support the case at hand and cover it with the Fiqh of minorities philosophy of integration. The Hanafî madhhab’s rule, which allows taking Ribâ from non-Muslims only and prohibits giving it, was based on the higher Shari’ah objective of preserving the money of the Muslims. Fiqh of minorities develop this idea and takes it a step forward—applying Fiqh of minorities Ijtihâd and main principles. Hence, in buying an essential property, taking the loan and paying the mortgage fulfills the objective of preserving the money of Muslims even more than taking it—taking into consideration the advantages mentioned in the first element. So based on the Shari’ah principle that matters are to be determined by their objectives, mortgage is a better use of Muslim money than rent.216

***

Recognizing the context from which the scholar come—Western, non-Western, hybrid and so forth—one can highlight certain strains of thought when looking to an issue facing Muslim minorities. These trends can be categorized into four main approaches or categories of scholars.

The first category is the “literalist or traditionalist scholars” who are mostly local scholars and cannot be considered Fiqh of minorities’ scholars. They look at the presence of Muslim minorities in the West as an unsatisfactory exception where surviving the foreign system reflects a divine test. Thus, no compromises, adaptations or reinterpretation may be considered. Such thought leans towards the isolation of Muslims. A significant number of its promoters are from Muslim-majority countries and have not been exposed to Western or non-Muslim communities’ experiences.

The second category includes the “international institution scholars”, like the ECFR, who are mostly international scholars, most of whom are from Muslim-majority countries either entirely or originally. Those scholars share a concern with the issues facing Muslim minorities. They understand the importance of Muslim presence in the west, and are avoiding challenging the fundamental sources and premises of traditional Fiqh. Instead, they adopt a method of reinterpretation and specialized ijtihād based on these fundamentals. They promote the importance of integration; however, many their premises and verdicts serve as a short-term and a temporary solution that does not necessarily respond to the essence of integration. Most of them, implicitly believe that the eventual normal place for Muslims to be is in an Islamic-ruled society. Thus, their approach is based on survival reflected in the concept of Darūra which implies dealing with an exceptional short-term situation.

216 QARADÂWÎ, supra note 48, at 167.

The third category includes the “adaptational scholars”, like ʿAlwâni, who are also international scholars and mostly have a direct experience and involvement with the west. Their exposure to both, the issues facing Muslims and the Western system lead to adopt an approach that tries to justify and explain how Muslim minorities are nor particularly different from the rest of their community. Rather the community itself entails different context, different rules and, consequently, different Verdicts. Thus, their work is based on attempts to fit Muslims within the society. Their aim is integration that fulfills the purpose of empowering Muslims, preserving their identity as part of the Umma message. Thus for them integration is mostly a means to an end.

The fourth and the last category are the “partnership scholars”, like Ramadan, who were originally born in the West. They include intellectuals who are not necessarily legal theorists—Fuqahā’-so are less interested on whether, for instance, mortgage is allowed or not. They view Muslims as Westerners, citizens and partners in the society, not minorities. They, hence, stress on the importance of bypassing short-term solutions to imposing convenient solutions based on the system of their society. They, view integration and citizenship as “inevitable” ends in themselves—as well as a means for other purposes of the Umma. Their approach is based on the desire to make one’s own society fit him or her and not the other way around.

The two case studies examined in this paper raise some important issues. One is whether it is time for scholars coming from Muslim majorities to leave the floor to “Western-Muslim” scholars who have clear and direct exposure and comprehension of the Western society. This raises a question regarding the nature of impact such change would make on the end result of ijtihād when it comes to Muslim minorities jurisprudential issues. The second question is whether Fiqh of minorities is still a project that lacks coherence and consistency among scholars and needs to be developed and institutionalized on wider scales and in a manner that pushes the boundaries of Ijtihād. For instance, although Qaradāwī reaches a “creative Ijtihād” opinion he still feels the need to “justify” it with evidence from traditional Fiqh. This is understandable in this case, where evidence was available in the first place. However, concerns arise when no clear evidence in the tradition is found and hence an Ijtihād that utterly depends on the texts and the objectives that are drawn from it is needed. The third and final question is whether Fiqh of minorities has to develop tools and discourses to address the receiving communities of the West themselves. For in dilemmas like the discrepancy between the Islamic legal system and the Western legal systems, in areas like perception to gender inequality for instance, scholars must search for common rationale and understandable explanations that deliver the message of cultural relativity and are valid.
VI- Conclusion:

Fiqh of minority scholars articulate the importance of the Islamic presence in non-Muslim societies in a unique way. Their objective is to help those who are searching for a healthy middle ground between being a dedicated Muslim and a loyal citizen. That is to say that, Muslim scholars advocating for Fiqh of minorities, are also, intentionally or unintentionally, advocating for the universality of the religious, cultural and developmental message of Islam, as well as promoting the notions of citizenship and positive integration. Thus, the real question Fiqh of minorities advocates are concerned with is not whether Muslim minorities should integrate or not. Rather, it is how they should integrate and what the necessary conditions required are for a positive integration that is beneficial for both the Muslim and his community. In other words, This Fiqh, while attempting to accomplish the mission of integration and preserving the Muslim identity, treats the Muslim not only as a Muslim with religious ritualistic obligations, but also as a member of a society and, more importantly, as a law abiding citizen in a modern society with rights and obligations. Such a context would turn integration from a mere means to an end in itself especially that Fiqh of minorities is “theoretically” designed to theorize for a permanent presence and the creation of a genuine “Western Muslim”.

As we have noticed, different Muslim scholars view the nature and the function of Fiqh of minorities from different perspectives. One can note that the scholars’ different backgrounds—Western/non-Western—impact their perceptions of the role of a Muslim in the West. On one side, scholars like ‘Alwânî and Ramadan—adaptational and partnership scholars, who either lived their entire life or most of it in these Western societies, highly appreciate the intrinsic value of citizenship. For instance Ramadan rejects the notion “minorities” and insists on Western Muslims or citizens. On the other side, Qaradâwî, Najjâr and Bin Bayya—international institutions scholars—view integration as a mere tool for other purposes, whether intentionally or unintentionally. Bin Bayya, does not even consider the concept of citizenship and still justifies Fiqh of minorities as a tool to respond to crucial—day to day—issues of Muslim minorities. Najjâr focuses on the concept of Da’wa and being a role model for the ultimate purpose of propagating the religious and civilizational message of Islam. Qaradâwî, though calls for a permanent presence, implicitly believing that the eventual and the normal place for Muslims to be is where the Muslim majorities are. He, thus, still perceives Muslim minorities’ issues in terms of temporality—which is reflected in him using Darûra and similar concepts as a basis for a Verdict.217

Such variation of backgrounds, and consequently perspectives, has several implications. First, the nature of the solution offered within the framework of Fiqh of minorities: long-term solutions which reflect permanent presence perception, versus short-term solutions which reflect a temporary presence perception. Second, the identity and role of Muslim minorities—promoting a “Western Muslims” identity; versus preserving the Muslim minorities’ identity occasionally residing in the West. On one side, the study has shown that more Western scholars tend to skew towards long term jurisprudential solutions as they believe in theorizing for a “permanent presence” of “Western Muslims”. On the other hand less Western scholars still theorize short-term solutions for Muslim minorities, temporarily residing in a non-Muslim society. Third, the latter–Western/non-Western dichotomy—is directly proportional to the nature of the relationship between Ijtihâd and tradition, in other words, abiding directly or indirectly to classic scholars’ jurisprudence. For example, one can notice the obvious gender inequality that highlights the methodology and Ijtihâd in case like İslâm al-zawja for instance. Qaradâwî contends that it is difficult for Muslim scholars to recognize legal opinions similar to İslâm al-zawja because it is contrary to what they have been used to and have inherited from the “traditional jurisprudential culture”. He, thus, encourages seeking “new” solutions while taking the latter into consideration to overcome the effects of this cultural influence. Ramadan also addresses this point by pointing out that specialists in Usûl al-Fiqh–foundations of laws and jurisprudence–are themselves “immersed in a cultural milieu and a society that influence the way they proceed . . . [which] shapes their mind and their way of looking at the Qur’ân and the world.”218

Hence, one can say that Fiqh of minorities has, to a large extent but not entirely, succeeded in providing a new original Ijtihâd. At one level, one can trace innovation and Ijtihâd in encouraging women to convert through not putting them in an either-or situation, encouraging them to

217 Half of the members of the ECFR are from the European continent and half are from the Arabian Peninsula, Northern Africa or Northern America. This is a breach of the internal rules of the ECFR, as members not residing in Europe “must not constitute more than 25% of the total members of the Council at any one time.” ECFR CONSTITUTION, § 8–5–, available at: http://www.euro-muslim.com/En_u_Foundation_Details.aspx?News_ID=343 (Last visited Feb. 11, 2012).
218 Ramadan, supra note 140, at 140.
strive for their husbands’ conversion, and while considering the essentiality of both sexual and emotional relationships on the one side and preserving the unity of the family on the other. However, on another level, when it comes to the receiving community and its legal system, in which Muslim minorities are living and interacting, Fiqh of minorities pays less attention to this community’s dynamics and value system. For example, there is obvious gender inequality, from the Western value system perspective, that highlights the methodology and ijtihād whether of traditional Fiqh or even Fiqh of minorities. This idea of the discrepancies between Western and Islamic culture and value systems makes us go back to Qaradāwī and Ramadan’s remarks on the still-persistent predicament of challenging the “inherited jurisprudential culture.”

The findings of this paper leave us with several thoughts. First, despite the discrepancies among scholars—which turn Fiqh of minorities into a means/tool or an end—it is, at the end of the day, a mere medium to the central notions forming integration, which are the attitudes, impressions and collective consciousness towards this integration that are either reflected or influenced by this medium. Without them, no integration is possible. Second, while Fiqh of minorities is designed to respond, in the general sense, to Muslim minorities’ attitudes towards integration, it hardly has any impact on the attitudes towards them from the receiving society. Finally, one is to wonder whether the amount of success of such Fiqh, in practice, is yet to be determined by the amount of Muslims welcoming the concept of this Fiqh. That is to say that, whether, in reality, the increase of Muslim minorities’ awareness and adoption of such methodology/perspective of Fiqh will have an eventual impact on the tendency towards a positive integration or not.

At the end of the day, Fiqh of minorities’ desired impact on Muslim minorities’ integration in their non-Muslim societies will only be effective when the attention shifts from developing a Western Fiqh for Muslim minorities to developing Western Muslim scholars who will be more capable of developing tools and discourses to address the western culture and value system in a way that fulfills the essence of the role of Fiqh of minorities especially when it comes to integration and the role of the Umma.
أولا: مقطع من مقابلة مع الشيخ يوسف القرضاوي

مقدمة الشيخ:

أهم شيء أن يعيش الإنسان بالإسلام، أن يعيش مسلماً كيف يكون ذلك؟ إذاً تحقق الإسلام بفرائضه وأحكامه وأخلاقه. فناهدم هدف فقه الأقليات هو أن يعرف المسلم ما هو الإسلام وما هي الإحكام الخاصة به وهذا المسلم باعتباره يعيش في مجتمع غير مسلم له احکامه التي تختلف عن أحكام من يعيشون داخل بلاد الإسلام. فالمسلم في هذا البلاد لا بد أن يعرف ما المطلوب منه وما الذي رفع عنه. هذا الأمر مقدم على الدعوة: أن يتبع مسلماً سواء في شخصك أو مع من حولك.

س: في كتابك حول فقه الأقليات قمت بالشارة في القسم الخاص بإحکام فقه الأقليات لتأكيد ضرورة الوجود الإسلامي في البلاد غير الإسلامية. فهى أشرت إلى واجب دعم المسلمين هناك، والتعريف بالسلام والمشاركة الإيجابية. فما تعليقك؟

ج: أهم شيء، وهو مقدم على بقية الأهداف، هو أن يعين فقه الأقليات الجماعات المسلمة على أن تحيا بالإسلام، "اتق الله حيثما شئت" فالأسلام مكع، أيضًا كنت، "وإلهي المشرق والمغرب فانعموا فثم وجه النور".

س: يوجد نوعين من أنواع النقد الموجه للفقه الأقليات: الأول يرى أن فيه تحريف وتلاعب بشرع الله، والآخر يرى أن فقه الأقليات لم يتغير في الحقيقة كثيراً، وأن كل ما ورد فيه من أحكام موجودة بالفعل في الفقه العام الأصلي.

فما رأيك على هاتين النقطتين؟

ج: الدور الأساسي للفقه الأقليات أنه دور تنظيمي حيث يرتب الأحكام والأصول بحيث يسهل على المفتي استخراج الأحكام منها. ففقه الأقليات جزء من الفقه العام، يستعمل نفس الأدلة ولكن ينزلها حسب واقعها. فالإسلام هناه كله نصوص خاصية، يجب أن نرى هل تستوجب أن ننقل أم نخفف عليه، وفي الغالب يكون نخففاً حيث أنه يعيش في بلاد لا تدين به على الإسلام. إذاً يجب أن نعرف و نستخدم هذه المخففات حتى يقوى و يتمكن بعد ذلك من الدعوة.

إذاً الدعوة أمر هام تجب فيه مراعاة طباع وظروف الناس الذين نقوم بدعوتهم. فالإسلام هناك مطالب أن يعرف الأحكام وملابسات التي تخفف عليه من جانب، ونتزم بأنه من جانب آخر، و هي مطالب تختلف عن تلك المطلوبة من مجتمعات الأغلبية المسلمة.

س: قمت بتقسيم الجهاد في فقه الأقليات إلى اجتهاد اثنائي وانتقائي... فما الفرق بينهما؟
ال أمر له ضوابط حيث تقوم باختيار الرأي الذي نراه أصح. لذلك لا يتخذ بأي رأي، وإنما بالرأي الأقوى حسب الأدلة، سواء النصية كالكتاب والسنة أو غيرها. لأنه في بعض الأحيان يكون الناس في حاجة لهذا الرأي والذي يقوم بحل مشكلات...

س: سأحاول أن أكون أكثر تحديداً في السؤال.. على سبيل المثال في حالة إسلام الزوجة و베اء زوجها على دينه...

 هذه الفتوى تستند إلى الاجتهاد الانتقائي.. هل الفتوى هنا خاصة بالآلبات أم على الإطلاق؟

ج: هو الحكم على الإطلاق .. وأخذنا بالرأي الذي يجوز للرجل أن يبقى مع امرئته استناداً إلى رأي عمر و علي-ض.

وجائزة التطبيق في أي دولة حتى في مصر إذا اختارت الزوجة أن تبقى مع زوجها.

س: إذا ما هو الفرق بين فقه الآلبات والفقه العام إذا كانت نفس الأحكام تطبق؟

ج: هناك أحكام لجميع وأخرى خاصة بالآلبات. فإن كان في حالة الآلبات يكون تطبيقه أولى لأنهم أحوج إلى هذا الرأي من غيرهم، ولكن ليس بالضرورة أن تكون الأحكام كلها خاصة بالآلبات.

س: هل ينطوق مثال ربا البنوك لشراء مساكن على الفقه المختص بالآلبات فقط ولا يجوز تطبيقه في العموم؟

ج: نعم.

س: هذا بالنسبة للانتقائي.. فماذا عن الفقه الإسلامي؟ وهناك من المستند إلى حدوث وارد عن الرسول-ص: "إن الله عز وجل قد فرض فروضاً فلا تطيعوا وحرم جرماً فلا تنتهكوها وحد حدوتاً فلا تعودوها وسكت عن أشياء غير نسيان فلا تبحثوا عنها"، فما رد فضيلكم?

ج: هذا الحديث لا يقف ضد الاجتهاد. فالاجتهاد له أداة كثيرة، فيجب أن يكون من المصادر المعروفة مثل القرآن والسنة وتشريع الماضين، والمصالح المرسلة، والعرف، والقياس، والإجماع. فالأمور إذا تتبى منهجياً ليست مرسلة، والاجتهاد ليس مرتب مستقبلاً وهو صالح في أي زمان أن يستبب منه ما يصلح للمسلمين. وفي كل زمان كان هناك ناس تجتهد اجتهادات كثيرة. هناك رسالة للامام السيوطي بعنوان "الرد على من أخذ إلى الأرض وأنكر أن الاجتهاد في كل عصر فرض". دعا الإمام في هذه الرسالة للإختيار ومنه على ذلك سير المختدين السابقين.

س: بدأ المصلحة والضرورة تبيح المحظورات .. هناك من يشير إلى إنه الوجه الآخر لعملة وجهها الأول الغاية تبرر الوسيلة.. فما ردكم؟

ج: عندنا في الإسلام الغاية لا تبرر الوسيلة. هناك محرومات وهناك أشياء ضرورية. فالضرورة تبيح المحظورات- المحرمات- و قد قسم العلماء الأمر إلى ثلاثة أمور: -1-أمور ضرورية كالاكل و الشرب و المزونس- 2-أمور حاجية يمكن أن يعيش بدونها ولكن مشقة: 3-أمور تحسينية وهي الكماليات.
الضرورات المشار إليها في الأمر الأول هي التي تبيح المحظورات فمثلاً شخص في حاجة إلى عملية جراحية حرجة، فيجوز له أن يأخذ ربا ولكن بضوابط، فيجب أن تقدر الضرورة بقدرها فإذا احتاج إلى مانحة جنية يأخذ مانحة جنية فقط وهناك، ففأداة تقول "فمن اضطر غيار ولا عاد فلا إثم عليه". البائع المتفق إلى الشهوة من هذا الأمر بالعاد أي من بعد على قدر الضرورة.

س: بالنسبة لبعض الولاء المزدوج بين الولاء للأمة والولاء للدولة التي يقيم فيها المسلم. خصوصاً فيما يرتبط ببداء الخدمة العسكرية لاسيما إذا أدى إلى مواجهات عسكرية مع دولة إسلامية؟

ج: هذه قتلى خاصة أقتوها بأعمال الحرب على الإرهاب بعد أحداث 11 سبتمبر، كان هناك مسلمين كثيرين في الجيش الأمريكي وأذا خرجوا منه جمعياً سيسبب ذلك في مشكلة كبيرة لهم. وقد وافقت لهم على هذا الطرف الخاص بشرط أن يحوزوا قدر الإمكاني ألا يبدوا بالقتال... ففيها لضوابط لقد قمت بتنازل قضيتك المواطنة والولاء المزدوج في كتاب بعنوان الوطن والمواطن، يمكنك الرجوع إليه للمزيد من التفاصيل. وأذكر فيه أن الدار في الإسلام تعبر عن مفهوم الوطن بالمعنى الحديث، إذاً يجوز التعامل من منطلق المواطنة ويمكن هناك إتمام للوطن وأُخرى وطنية وقومية، وعلى هذا الأساس يتعامل المسلمون مع غيرهم.

س: كيف ترى أثر الأقليات في انماج المسلمين في المجتمعات غير المسلمة؟

ج: نحن دائما ندعو المسلمين إلى ضرورة اندماجهم على أن لا يذبووا في المجتمع. اندمج بلا ذوبان. فيعيشوا في المجتمع ويثرثروا فيه ويحتفظوا بهويتهم وعقيدتهم وعباداتهم ومكارم أخلاقهم. فدعوة الناس للاندمج لا تعني أن تترك العقيدة بل أن تعمل سوياً لخدمة المجتمع.

س: د. ط. جابر الشعالي، يؤكم أن وجود المسلمين هناك ليس فقط مباح وإنما هو فرض عليهم أن يقيموا و يندمجوا هناك. فما هو تعليقك؟

ج: الوجود الإسلامي ضروري في الغرب ويجب أن يكون له تأثير. فيديفه الأساسي أن يحكي المسلمون الداخليين في الإسلام والقادمين لهم والمسلمين الأصليين في البلاد حتى يتعلموا الإسلام الصحيح ويعابضوا عليه ويقوموا بدور الدعاة للإسلام. هذه هي مهمة الوجود الإسلامي الذي يبنى ويستمر و ينتشر و يزداد.

س: ما هو وضع فقه الأقليات في خريطة الفقه العام؟ هل هو فرع أم باب أم أمر آخر؟

ج: هو فقه قام به مجموعة من المسلمين يشبهه في تصنيفه على سبيل المثال فقه المرأة المسلمة. فهو باب من الأبواب يختص جماعة من المسلمين تعني خارج دار الإسلام. فيقدم هذا الفقه ما يتعلق بهم حتى يسر على العلماء تم أولاً يتساهلوا وقنا ومهجوداً للبحث في الكتب والمراجع الخاصة بالأحكام والأصول. هذا الفقه له أمور تقتصر على
الأقليات فقط مثل فوائد البنوك للمسكون ولكن امور أخرى يشترك فيها عموم المسلمين كافة ولكن الأقليات أولى بتطبيقها مثل إسلام الزوجة.

ثانياً: مقتفط من مقابلة مع `وط جابر العلواني

مقدمة حول المؤثرات على الفقيه

أنا كفمي عندما اتحدث عن فقه الأقليات قد أعترف بأنه شيء عديدة ولكن لا ينبغي أن أخرج عن الأصول والقواعد التي تجعل من القرآن الكريم المصدر المشني لكل حكم شرعي ولا مصدر عندها للأحكام إلا القرآن وحده. فهو المصدر المشني للأحكام والكائح عنها. أما السنة الديوبية فهي تابعة له. وتدور في فلكه دورة التتابع المتتابع ودوران المطبق للنظرية. فالقرآن يعملنا نظرية والسنة تعطينا منهج للتطبيق. وهما مصادر متعاوضان لا ينفع أي منهما عن الآخر. فكل سنة ثابتة أصل في القرآن المجيد تستند إليه. وآيات القرآن المجيد يتبناها رسول الله بعد تلقيه لها ويعملها للناس ويزيدهم بها. ويدخل عليه الصلاة والسلام حركة الآيات في واقع الناس لتزكيتهم وتثبيتهم واتهامهم وانعكاسهم.

فلا ينبغي أن تكون العلاقة عنه واضحة بأن "إن الحكم إلا الله"- إن مع الاستثناء في اللغة تقيد الحصر والقصر.

فليس لأن حق التشريع إلا الله وحده...

س: إذا فما هو تصنيفك لدور الاجتهاد؟

ج: دور الاجتهاد هو التلقي. أن تلتقي النص مع فهم الواقع فيما جيدا بحيث ننزل هذا الحكم على هذا الواقع بما ينسبه فالفقيه. فالاجتهاد يقوم على ركين: الأول دراسة النص- استنباطاً و استدلالاً؛ ثم معرفة الواقع. و في عصرنا هذا يقوم الفقيه بصياغة مشكلات الواقع ليلقي بها أسئلة على النص. و هناك قواعد و ضوابط لتحليله و التأويل فتسلم حقا أن أقول ما أريد. "هل عنديكم من سلطان بهذا"... "لا نقولوا لما تصف البستنا الكتب هذا حالو و هذا حرام".

فالفقيه حالة عقلية و نفسية. و ليست حرة - لله كله، بحيث لا يكون فيها من يقبل ما لا يراه عليه ما لم ينزل الله به سلطان.

س: نعود إلى فقه الأقليات. كيف بدأت الفكرة؟

ج: أنا الأحرف أقول: أول من كتب في هذا الأمر. وقد كان المتقدمون يكتبون في فقه النوازل. و قد كتبته بفسحة معينة و باعتبارنا مواطنينا الأمريكية تعرض على عشرات المسائل اليوما و النوازل للمسلمين في كثير من أنحاء العالم. لم يكن الغرض في الأصل هو كيفية إدماج أقليات المسلمين في غيرهم، حيث أن عنهم أصول أستعداد لتقليد و التبعية و الجودان.
بحكم بينهم الأصلية نجم عن العيش في التقليد قروناً. فنحن على استعداد أن نذوب في أي مجتمع أو ثقافة. فقد ورثنا فكرة التقليد - في مقابل فكرة الاجتهاد الذي يمكن تصنيفه أنه تفكير إبداعي ي يقوم به عالم مؤهل في علوم الدين و اللغة لاستنباط حكم و استدلال بنص على حكم القرآن يبحث على الاجتهاد في عدة مناسبات.

س: فما هي إذا الدواعي التي أدت إلى تأسيس فقه الأقلية؟

ج: عندما كنت في أمريكا لاحظت قدم ثلاث موجات للهجرة المسلمة. وقد ذابت هذه الموجات تماماً في المجتمع الأمريكي وأصبحوا أميركان قليلاً و قليلاً. الإسلام انتشر في جنوب شرق آسيا و غيرها من خلال التجارة، ونحن الآن في أمريكا منا المساندة والطلاب والأطباء والمهندسين فقد كوارد المجتمع و قلة من المسلمين هناك هم الفقراء و يجب أن نستعذ هذا الوضع الاجتماعي الجيد بشكل أفضل. فغرض فقه الأقلية الأنساني هو أن نمنع الموجة الرابعة من الدوافع مثل سابقتها، فتعني للسلام وال культуры المطلقة من خلال فقه لا يجعلهم يعيشون حالة من انفصام الشخصية بحيث تكون عددهم شخصيتين متناقضتين: مواطن أمريكي و انسان مسلم.

الخ: عندما كنت في أمريكا لاحظت قدم ثلاث موجات للهجرة المسلمة. وقد ذابت هذه الموجات تماماً في المجتمع الأمريكي وأصبحوا أميركان قليلاً و قليلاً. الإسلام انتشر في جنوب شرق آسيا و غيرها من خلال التجارة، ونحن الآن في أمريكا منا المساندة والطلاب والأطباء والمهندسين فقد كوارد المجتمع و قلة من المسلمين هناك هم الفقراء و يجب أن نستعذ هذا الوضع الاجتماعي الجيد بشكل أفضل. فغرض فقه الأقلية الأنساني هو أن نمنع الموجة الرابعة من الدوافع مثل سابقتها، فتعني للسلام والiculture المطلقة من خلال فقه لا يجعلهم يعيشون حالة من انفصام الشخصية بحيث تكون عددهم شخصيتين متناقضتين: مواطن أمريكي و انسان مسلم.

س: هل يعني ذلك أن فتوى جواز الـ mortgage على سبيل المثال في حالة الأقلية؟

ج: لا، أنا أصلح حين أدرس بعناية النظام الأمريكي و فنسفته لا أجد حققة ربا القران و السنة موجودة فيه، لأن الفكرة في زيادة الفائدة في البنوك و إنقاصها مرتبطة بالضخيم (inflation) على سبيل المثال إذا أفترضت مثل مانة جن فيه و كانت تساوي حينها جراماً من ذهب، و الآن هذه المانة جن فيه أصبحت قيمتها تساوي نصف جرام ذهب فقط فالهدف
يصبح أن أرد القيمة الأساسية للمبلغ التي تمكنت من شراء جرام الذهب. إذاً يصبح هدف فاتنة البنوك أن تحتفظ لك
بقيمة توقع كمها، وتحمي من آثار التضخم لإن تحقق رباحاً على قرض يكون بمثابة ثمن للزمن الذي لا يملكه
الإنسان و ليس له أن يتجرب فيه.

س: ولكن كيف يكون حكم هذا مختصاً عن بلاد المسلمين؟

ج: أنا لا أرى من اختلافاً لكن الفقه هنا في الشرق لا يفهم إلا هذه اللغة ولا يزال يؤمن بمصطلحات مثل دار الحرب إذاً
قامت بتعميم الأمر فسوف يقوم بمعارضتة و قد يتهمني أنني أفتى بما يخالف رأي الجماعة أو الإجماع.

الدورة الاقتصادية الغربية و ارتباطها بفكرة التضخم تجعل على سبيل المثال هذا القلم اليوم شبه جنونية، قد يصبح
جنيها و نصف... فماذا أفعل كي أنشقك؟ أقوم بزيادة القيمة الشرائية للجنيه الخاص بك بحيث أجعله متماسياً مع أسعار
السوق والدوره الاقتصادية.

س: لماذا أشعر إذاً أن الإباحة تكون في حالة الضرورة؟

ج: أنا لا أرى أنها تكون في حالة الضرورة فقط. فدورة الاقتصاد الغربي مختصفة عن تلك الموجودة في البلاد
الإسلامية. فنحن في الشرق هنا لا توجد دورة اقتصادية فهو نظام اقتصادي غير متقدم. و عندما يأتي عالم من هذه
البيئة و يريد أن يفرض هذه الثقافة على مجتمع متقدم فهو بذلك يضعف الاقتصادات الإسلامية و يعمل على إقفارها. هدف
أ ngũهم أن فاتنة البنك ليست هي ربا الدين، و أن البنك عندما أفرضى، لأن مندورة الاقتصادية، يجعل المال يعمل مع الوقت و الإنتاج و التوزيع و الاستهلاك ولا يفصل مكون عن الآخر.

س: هل يمكن أن نفسر ذلك أن فقه الأقلية تجاوز كونه قفًا للإسناتصال و لكنه يتحمص في قضايا و خصائص
الموقع أمامه يخرج بفتوى متنازلية معه بفكر الغرب و ليس بثقافة الدول الإسلامية؟

ج: أجل، فعله سبيل المثال عندما يسألني العراقي هل أدخل الانتخابات في ظل الاحتلال الأمريكي للبلاد أقول له لا. في
حين أنه عندما يسألني المسلم الأمريكي و يسألني هل أدخل الانتخابات فأجيبه أن يجب عليه أن يدخل وقد أعطيه بان
يعطي صوته للطلاب بالتحديد لأننا نناقشنا معه حول بعض القضايا و التسهيلات الخاصة بالمواطنين المسلمين و التزم و
وافق العمل على تحقيقها. فإذا قوى و هذه قوى إلا أن هذا لا يعد قوة دين و لكنه يسمى فقه دين، و فقه الدين هو فقه
تطبيق الدين فاننا بشر لي ظروف فيكف أستجيب لهذه الظروف و أربط الدين بواعظ بحيث أقرب إلى الله من خلاله...
و ذلك هو فقه الدين.

فعلى سبيل المثال عندما نسألني فناء فنزعة سامية اجبرت على خلع الحجاب في المدرسة. ماذا فعل؟ الفتوى التقليدية
مستنصحها إما أن تترك البلد أو أن تكثف في المنزل و تزوج. أما أنا فأتنصحها بخلعها داخل المدرسة واردتدانها ثانية عند
خروجه تأثير أمة مما كان مفعولاً. فقه الآلية هدفه المحافظة على الشخصية الإسلامية في الغرب أولاً و
من أجل دعوة غير المسلمين إلى التأثر بالإسلام وقبوله ثانياً.

س: ماؤ عن دور الأمية الإسلامية ورسالتها؟ كيف ترتبط بفقه الآلية؟

ج: أنا أقول لله كن نموذجاً لغيرك و تلك هي الدعوة الصامتة. فصر على سبيل المثال لم تفتح بالعسكر وإنما
فتحت بمدينة الفسطاط التي قام ببنائها المسلمون لتكون مثالاً وقدوة و كانت سبباً كبيراً في دخول عدد كبير من
crs

المصريين في الإسلام.

س: كيف يفسر أو يوصل فقه الآلية للوجود الإسلامي في المجتمعات غير المسلمين؟

ج: الواقع يقول: إنَّ الهدف الحقيقي والأصلي لإقامة هذا العلم من المسلمين هناك يرجع إلى أسباب سياسية واقتصادية
و اجتماعية ولا يقتصر على رسالة الإرادة أو وجهة نظرها. فإذا كان هناك نموذج على هويتهم الإسلامية ونعمهم من
الدين، فقال: عش في الغرب إن شئت ولكن عش كمسلمًا غربًا فلا تخن البلد الذي تعيش فيه وأحيه مثلما أحبت وطنك الأصلي. فدممت تملك
حرية العبادة والدين فهي أرضك و أرض الله. ونحن هنا نسعى إلى أن ننقا ما يمكن إنقاذه.

س: هل هذا معنا أن الهدف الأساسي من فقه الآلية هو حفظ الدين؟

ج: حفظ الهوية... و الدين مصدر من مصادرها. فنحن نريد أن نوصل للوجود الإسلامي حيث لا يكون وجوداً طارئاً و
إذا كن تمادياً دائماً مستقراً يشكلاً جزءاً من المجتمع الغربي. لأن المسلم يحمل خطاباً عالياً، فإن الله أمرنا بإرسال "لا
إله إلا الله" إلى كل بقاع الأرض. فالإسلام يترك على ثلاثة دعوات و هي المقصد الأساسي منه: 1- التوحيد: أي تحقيق
وحدانية الألوهية و العبادة الله وحدة- 2- الأمة: أي تشكيل أمة تكون نموذجاً ييمني الناس به تقوم بواجب الشهادة- 3-الدعوة: أي أصال القرآن لكل ركن من أركان الأرض

س: ما هو المقصود بالمود؟

ج: أنا أريد أمة تدعو إلى الله على بصيرة، خير أمة أخرجت للناس تأمر بالمعرفة. ونتهي عن المنكر و تؤمن الله
قائمة على فكرتي الخيرية و الإخراج و تقوم على واجب الشهادة. فالإسلام في حجة إلى الأمة الإسلامية القائمة تك
هدفها تحقيق رسالة الله بشكل ما في ظروف ما.

و كيف تستجيب لظروف الغرب و نظامه الاقتصادي... فماؤ عن حالة إسلام
الزوجة؟ هل هي أيضاً مختصة بالغرب أم على المسلمين كافة؟

vi
ج: الإسلام جاء ليعمر البيوت لا ليخربها. إذا طبقنا الفقه التقليدي يصبح الأمر في نظر الغرب أن الإسلام يساوي خراب بيت، وأن تلك المرأة إذا دخلت في الإسلام سيخرب بيت. فلا بد من معالجة هذا الأمر، و قد تأولنا هذا الموضوع و عرضنا وجهة نظرنا شكل مستفيض. وقد ذهب المجلس الأوروبي إلى مثل ما ذهبنا إليه فارجعي إلى ذلك.
و إن كان هذا الحكم يمكن تطبيقه على الأكثرين أيضا فهو بالأصل انتج للأقلية وقد بيننا الضوابط فيه مثل أن لا يضيق عليها زوجها في دينها و أن تكون هي نفسها راغبة في البقاء معه، فارجعي إلى ذلك كله و ادرسيه لتتبيني حقيقة الفتوى و أدانتها.

س: ما هي الخصائص المختلفة في فقه الأقليات التي تجعله قادرًا على التعامل مع قضايا الأقليات أفضل أو بشكل مختلف عن الفقه العام التقليدي؟

ج: فقه الأقليات فيه ملاحظة للمجتمع الغربي و انظمته، إلى جانب فلسفة الرغبة في توطين الإسلام هناك و الخروج من فكرة الوجود الطارئ للمسلمين هناك إلى كونه وجود مستمر. فالاندماج لا يعني أن أزل الحواجز بحيث أصبح نسخة نمطية من الأمريكي العادي. وإنما هو الاندماج الإيجابي في أن يعيش المسلم بإسلامه و هويته الإسلامية، و لكن في مجتمعه الغربي وهي في الضرورة تكون هوية مختلفة عن هوية المسلمين في مجتمعات الأغلبية. فنأول له عش هناك ووطن الإسلام معاً، و عش به و فيه و ادع إليه سواك بسلوكك و حسن إسلامك و تصرفك.

س: أخيراً، كيف ترى موقع فقه الأقليات على خريطة الفقه العام؟

ج: هو عبارة عن تطوير لفظه التوازى الذي عرفه فقهنا جيداً منذ القدم، إلا أن مفهوم التوازى يفرض حالة من الشعور بالدونية و السلبية و التوقي. و الغرض ليس فصل المسلمين في الغرب عن باقي المسلمين كما يتهمه الداعون للأذى به في تلك البيئات، و إن وجود المسلمين في الغرب يعد ميزة يجب أن يستفيدوا منها و لا أريد أن يتعاملوا مع الأمر على أنه استثناء أو ضرورة-فإنما موجود هكذا باختياري. كيف يكون وجودي ضرورى؟ و لكنه أمر يقبله الإسلام من حيث الأساس لاختلاف الظروف و بالتالي الأحكام. و الإسلام أولى و أخراً دين و خطاب عالمي، مهمتنا أن نعيش و أن نحمله للأرض كلها و كل من يعيش فيها و عليها، و الله أعلم.
Translation of interviews (adapted)

First: an excerpt from an interview with Sheikh Yusuf al-Qaradâwî

Introduction by the Sheikh:

That a man lives by Islam, this is the most important thing, to live as a Muslim. And how can this be fulfilled? If Islam was established through its provisions and morals. The main goal of the Fiqh of minorities is to know what Islam is, and what its special provisions are, and this Muslim living in a non-Muslim society has provisions that differ from the provisions of those living within the Islamic countries. Muslim in this country must know what is required from him and what is he is released from. This matter is a priority that comes before inviting: to live as a Muslim either in yourself or with those around you

Q: in your book about jurisprudence of minorities you pointed out in the section concerned with its objectives to the need to consolidate the presence of Muslims in non-Muslim country... For example, you pointed out to the importance of supporting the Muslims there, and the introducing or acquainting with Islam and positive participation. What is your comment?

A: the most important thing, that comes before the rest of the goals, is to help minority Muslim groups to live in Islam, "Beware of God where ever you are" Islam will be with you wherever you are, " And to Allah belong the east and the west, so wherever you turn yourselves or your faces there is the Face of Allah"

Q: there are two types of criticism of the jurisprudence of minorities ... the first one think that there is distortion and manipulation with God law, and the other believes that the jurisprudence of minorities did not really bring anything new, and that all its provisions are already in the literature of the original jurisprudence. What is your response to these points?

A: the primary role of the jurisprudence of minorities is an organizational role where provisions and assets are arranged so that it's easier for the jurisprudent to extract provisions from it. Jurisprudence of minorities is a part of general Fiqh , using the same evidence but inflicted by its own reality. Muslim there has special circumstances, and we must think if it require to mitigate or ease it for him or to overburden him ,and usually we ease it for him as he lives in a country that doesn’t help him with Islam. We should know and use these buffers or mitigations till he get strong enough and can then be able to invite.

Inviting is an important issue and must consider the circumstances and temperaments of the people whom we invite. Muslim there must know the provisions and circumstances which mitigate on one side, and force him to do something on the other side it to another, and is the required demands differ from those of Muslim majority societies.

Q: you have divide judgment in jurisprudence of minorities into constructive and selective judgment ... What is the difference?

A: The issue has its controls where we choose the view which we see it as the most right one ... So we don’t take any opinion, but the strongest opinion according to evidences, whether textual like Qur’an and Sunna or others kinds of evidence. Because sometimes people are in need of this opinion that resolves problems...

Q: I will try to be more specific. For example, in the case of a wife who became a Muslim and her husband still adopt another religion ... This opinion based on the selective case ... is the opinion here is especial for minorities or for all?

A: It’s for all ... And we take the view which allows the man to remain with his wife according to Omar and Ali. The application is admissible in any State, even in Egypt if the wife chose to remain with her husband.

Q: so, what is the difference between minority jurisprudence and General jurisprudence if the same provisions are applied?

A: there are provisions for all, and others concerned with minorities. If they are to be applied first in the case of minorities because they need this opinion more than the others but not necessarily all provisions for minorities.

Q: does the example of the banks usury apply to buying homes on the jurisprudence of minorities only and may not be applied in the Commons (issues)?

A: Yes

Q: this for the selective ... What about the constructive jurisprudence? There is a criticism based on an interview Ward on the Messenger (peace be upon him): "God Almighty had imposed prescriptions, so don't lose destroy them and forbid others, so don't violate them and assigned certain limits, so don't transgress them and didn't mention so other things, not forgetting them, so do not search for (contemplate) them", what your kind reply?

A: this hadith does not stand against the judgment. So judgment has many considerable evidences, it must be from known sources such as the Qur'an and the Sunnah and the ancient legislation and common interests, custom, measurement, and unanimity. So the matters follow a systematic track and not haphazard and judgment is not linked to time as it is valid for anytime that Muslims can conclude from it what works for Muslims. And at all times there were many people striving for judgments. There is a message from Imam Al-suyooti titled "response (refutation) to those who succumb and denied that judgment is a must (imposition) at all times" the Imam called for practicing judgment, demonstrated by the conduct of the ancient.

Q: the principle of “interest and that necessity permit prohibitions. There are some people who indicate that this is the other side of a coin, the other side of it says that the end justifies the means. What is your response?

A: what we have in Islam is that, the goal does not justify the means. There are forbidden things and there are necessary things. Necessities permit prohibitions. Scientists have divided it into three things: (1) essential as eating and drinking and sleeping; (2) things needed, can live without but laboriously; (3): improvement things i.e. luxurious.

Requirements referred to in the first item are the ones that permit prohibitions for example: a person in need of a critical surgery, it may take usury but with controls, you should appreciate the necessity of it if he needs a hundred pounds he should only take this hundred pounds and so on. The verse says " But if one is forced by necessity, without willful disobedience, nor transgressing due limits,- then is he guiltless. "The disobedient willingly, forward-looking for lust in this subject, and the transgressor is the one who goes beyond the limits of necessity.

Q: for the dilemma of dual loyalty, loyalty to the nation and loyalty to the State where Muslim lives in... Especially in connection with the performance of military service, particularly if it led to military clashes with Islamic State?

A: this is a special Fatwa (opinion) they give it as an advisory opinion in the course of the war on terrorism after September 11, that there were many Muslims in US Army and if discharged all, will cause them a big trouble ... I agreed on this special circumstance, provided that they try as far as possible not to start fighting ... It also has its controls (limits).

I've addressed the issue of citizenship and dual loyalty in a book entitled home and citizenship, you can refer to for more details. I remember that the Dar (residence) in Islam expresses the modern concept of home; you may conduct according to citizenship and have affiliation with home, beside national and nationalistic brotherhood. And on this basis Muslims can deal with others.

Q: How do you see the impact of the jurisprudence of minorities on the integration of Muslims in non-Muslim societies?

A: We always invite Muslims that they need integration but they don't melt into society; Integration without melting. They live in the society and have their influence but retain their identity and beliefs and rectitude and integrity. Inviting people to integrate does not mean leaving faith but to work together to serve the community.

Q: Taha Jabir ‘Alwânî confirms that the presence of Muslims there is not only permissible but is a must; they must reside and get integrated there. What is your comment?

A: Islamic presence is necessary in the West and must have an impact. Its main objective is to protect Muslims entering in Islam and those coming to them and the country's indigenous Muslims in order to learn Islam properly and helped on it and serve as advocates for Islam. This is the task of the Islamic presence that remained, continued, spread and grow.

Q: What is the status of the jurisprudence of minorities in General jurisprudence map? Is it a branch, a section, or something else?

A: It is the jurisprudence done by a group of Muslims, it resemble for example, Fiqh of Muslim women as a matter of classification. It is a chapter concerned with a group of Muslims living outside the Home of Islam. This jurisprudence provides what is related for them to make it easier for scholars to save time and effort while searching in the books and references concerned with provisions and assets... This Fiqh contains subjects related only to minorities just like banks interests for housing, and other subjects involving all Muslims but first applied for such minorities e.g. a wife becoming a Muslim.

Introduction on different influences on jurists as a jurisprudent, when I talk about jurisprudence of minorities I may get influenced by many things, but I should not break the rules that make Quran the source establishing every provision, it is the only source of provisions, the Qur’an is the source establishing provisions and revealing them. As for the Sunnah, it follows it, moves in orbit round it like a planet orbiting the sun. It is the same for that who applies a theory. Qur’an gives a theory (a basis), and Sunnah gives us an approach to the application. And both of them are mutually reinforcing sources, inseparable from each other, every established Sunnah has a fixed basis in the Qur’an, and the Glorious Quran verses recited by the Messenger of God after receiving it and teaching them to people to purify and take them into a higher standard, anything else is nothing but a diligent work of scholars, only recommendations Islam is not obliged by any of them, Islam is only committed by the evidences emerging from the Quran and their applications in the Sunnah.

The scholar should reckon only on one bias that “the command is for none but Allah” command is (exclusively) only to God". Only God alone has the right to legislate...

Q: If so what is your rating of the role of Ijtihâd?

A: the role of Ijtihâd is to receive; To receive a text with a good understanding of reality (present situation), so as to apply this provision to actual situation using what is suitable for it. So any judgment is based on two pillars: the first is to study the text as a matter of elicitation and inference, second is to understand the reality; And in our time the jurisprudent formulates the actual problems in the form of questions interrogating the text. And there are rules and controls for interpretation and explanation, as I’m not free to say what I want ... “No warrant have ye for this " ... " But say not - for any false thing that your tongues may put forth." So judgment is a mental and psychological situation–it’s not a job-for the whole nation, so as no one in the nation accepts anything that has no proof, something that Allah did not warrant or authorized.

Q: back to the jurisprudence of minorities ... How did the idea start?

A: As far as I know I’m the first one who wrote about this theme, the preceding used to write about jurisprudence of the new (unfamiliar) situations. For me I wrote in it following a certain philosophy. Being an American citizen subjected to dozens of questions every day and I have met with Muslims from different parts of the world. The purpose, originally, was not how to integrate Muslims minorities with others convert them, since they have been already ready or susceptible to imitation, dependency and melting by virtue of their original environment as they live as imitators for centuries. We are ready to dissolve in any society or culture. We've inherited the idea of (imitation) versus the idea of Ijtihâd, which could be classified as creative thinking practiced by a qualified scholar both in language and religion sciences to develop a judgment and reference to it by a text to justify an inference. The Quran urges us to practice Ijtihâd on several occasions.

Q: so what are the reasons which led to the founding of the jurisprudence of minorities?

A: When I was in America I noticed the arrival of three waves of migration. These waves have melted completely in American society and become American by heart and soul. Islam spread in Southeast Asia and other through trade, and we are now in America as professors, students, doctors, and engineers, we are cadres of the society and a few Muslims there are poor and we must use this good social status in a better way. A basic purpose of the jurisprudence of minorities is to prevent the fourth wave from melting, like its predecessors, by giving Muslims both male and female their independent personality through jurisprudence that does not make them live a State of schizophrenia, to have two contradictory personalities: an American citizen and a Muslim person.

The second purpose of the jurisprudence of minorities is to prevent Muslims from conveying manifestations of underdevelopment and deviation to the Muslim minorities’ societies in the West, because we want Muslim to convey his best and ignore the worst behavior has to be an advocate of Islam through his righteous behavior... How? Any jurisprudence has its relationship with the general culture, it is one of the founding pillars of that culture. As culture gives inputs to the jurisprudence through its questions, and at the same time following the jurist’s answers will turn into behaviors which will turn into culture. This culture moves us whether deliberately or unintentionally. This dialectic relationship between jurisprudence and culture is so intimate, Islamic jurisprudence was set in times when production, distribution and consumption had been subject to industrial societies standards not farming societies ones. When the jurisprudence... scholar conveys this to the industrial environment and he is still subject to the same old scenario, inevitably his advisory opinion will confront or collide with the reality.

For example, in case of the (mortgage), traditional scholars made their judgment that it is forbidden. for me, I see it different from the concept of usury in Quran and its applications in Sunnah. And this takes many types of transactions out of the circle of banned usury; the American economic system assesses the home price, and then calculates its virtual age and tries to make the profit slightly higher than the interest rate in the banks...

Q: does this mean that an advisory opinion that the mortgage is not forbidden is based on the idea that, basically, it’s not usury or it’s a matter of necessity?

A: No, from the beginning when I study carefully the American system and its philosophy I don't find usury as mentioned in the Qur'an and Sunnah does really exist, because the idea of increasing and decreasing interest in the banks is inflation-linked, for example: if I took a loan of one hundred pounds from you and at that time it was equal to one gram of gold, and now the value of this hundred pound equals half gram of gold, so the aim is to give you back the original value of the money that makes you able to buy a gram of gold. So, the objective of the of banks interest is to maintain the value of your money as it was, and protect it from the effects of inflation and not profit on loan as a price for the time man do not own and he is not allowed to buy and sell it or to trade in it.

Q: but how could a provision like this be different from that in Muslim countries?

A: I don't see it different but jurists here in the east doesn't understand this language and still believes in terms such as Dâr al-harb, so if I circulate this he will oppose me and may accuse me that I’m issuing fatwa against or in contravention with the opinion of the whole community or unanimous view.

Western economic cycle and its association with the idea of inflation makes, for example, this pen today price one pound, but tomorrow it will be one pound and half ... What do I do in order to be fair to you? I increase the purchasing power of your pound so keeping it in line with market prices and the economic cycle.

Q: so why did you say that allowance only in case of necessity?
A: I don't see that it’s only in case of necessity. The Western economy cycle differs from those in Islamic countries. Here in the East there is no such economic cycle as it is not an advanced economic system. And when a scholar comes to this environment and wants to impose this culture to advanced society he, in this behavior, is weakening the Muslim minorities and leading to their impoverishment. My goal is to let them know that bank interest was not the usury of the loan, and that when the bank loaned me money, having an economic cycle, the bank makes money works with time, production, distribution and consumption and does not separate any component from the other component.

Q: Can that mean that Fiqh of minorities bypasses the idea of exceptions to come up with verdicts that suites the west with its ideologies and culture?

A: Yes, for example when an Iraqi asks me whether he should vote in the elections under an American occupation I would tell him not to. While if an America Muslim asks whether he should vote in the American elections I would urge him to and I would recommend certain candidates who showed cooperation with the Muslim community.

Q: what about the role of the Umma and its message? And how do you associate it to Fiqh of minorities?

A: I always tell Muslims to become a model for other; this is called the silent Da’wa. Egypt for example was not conquested by war but by the City of Fustat that was built by Muslims to be a model and was the biggest reason for a lot of conversion.

Q: How does Fiqh of minorities establish for a Muslim presence in non-Muslim communities?

A: reality implies that the real target for Muslims residing in the west goes back to political, economic and social reasons; it’s rarely the purpose of Da’wa that pushes them. Fiqh of minorities tries to deal with this fact and make the utmost use out of it. We found Muslims over there so we try to work on preserving their identity and protect them from total assimilation.

Q: Does that mean that the main reason behind Fiqh of Minorities is to preserve religion or faith?

A: preserving the identity is the main reason and religion is one of its elements. We want to establish the Muslim presence in the west so that it is more than just a temporary presence, but a presence that forms part of the community because the Islamic message is universal. Islam depends on three main pillars: Unitarianism, Umma and Da’wa.

Q: we discussed the issue of mortgage and how it responds to the western context and its economic system, what about the case of Islam al-Zawja? And is it a case limited to the west only or an issue that can be applied anywhere even in Muslim countries?

A: Islam came to protect families not to push them to collapse. If we applied traditional Fiqh to this case, the west would view Islam as a destructor of the family. Thus Islam has to deal with this issue with sensitivity. While this case can be applied on the majority as well, it was originally modeled for the minorities in non-Muslim countries.

Q: what are the special characteristics in Fiqh of minorities that makes it more qualified in dealing with minorities’ issues?

A: Fiqh of minorities observes the Western community and its system. Integration doesn’t mean to remove all the borders whatsoever and become an identical copy of a stereotypical American. We care about a positive integration where a Muslims lives with his faith and identity in his western society.

Q: Finally, where do you see Fiqh of minority in the map of Fiqh in its general sense?

A: Fiqh of minorities is a modernization to Fiqh al-Nawazil that was known in traditional Fiqh. However, the term “Nawazil” implies a temporary situation and leaves an inferior and a negative impression. The main objective is to avoid separation between Muslims and the rest of the Muslim community in the rest of the world. Rather we are trying to take advantage of the Muslim presence in the west. Islam at the end of the day is a Universal religion and message our mission is to deliver it to the whole world. God Knows best.